

ABRIDGEMENT,

Or rather,
A Bridge of Roman Histories,
to passe the necrest way
from TITVS LIVIVS to CORNELIUS TACITUS.

Under which
(In Three Bookes)

AS IT WERE THROUGH THREE

ARCHES, for the space of Sixescore yeeres, the Fame and Fortune of the Romans ebbs and flowes.

William Fulbecke.

LONDON,
Printed by T.E. for RICHARD MORE.
1608.

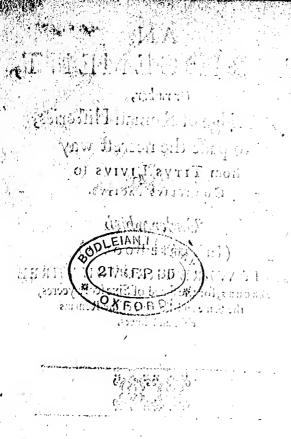

(2365.0.9)

£$£$£$£$£$£$£$

The Præface to the Reader.

Ourteene yeares are now runne out fithence I fully ended and dispatched this historicall labour: for departing from the Vniuersitie of Oxford in the yeare 1,584, and addressing my selfe

to the studie of the Law, I thought it more conuenient and reasonable at once to finish and perfect this worke, which I had already begun, then breaking my course with delaies to be still striking on the annill, knowing that things begun, are more easily concluded then thinges interrupted can be conjoyned; wherefore in that very yeare and some few daies following, I did begin continue and confirmmate the three bookes of this historie, since which time it hath lyen in the couert of my studie, of my selfe seldome looked on, of others some times read, who by vrgent perswasion would have mooned me to offer it to the publike view of my countreymen, to which I would in no wife condificend, alleaging for reason that it would be thought a blemish of impudencie in me to affay the discription of such things, which by Appian, Plutarch, Paterculus, & others have bene excellently delinered; which I tooke to be a sufficient sortresse and support of my excuse and refusall, but againe I heard that all the Romane writers which have reported the accidents of this historie, are either in their narrations too long and prolize, or elfe too harsh and unpleasant, or else so exceeding briefe that the coherence and mutuall dependance of things could hardly be discerned or conjectured in the narrow compasse of so strict desciphering. This I heard with patience, and answered with silence, for I durst not oppose my blunt arguments to their daintie appetite the truth standing so in the middle way betwist bs both, that I could not with fafe conscience in all these allegations diffent from them, nor with found opinion in all confent vuto them, wherefore weighing more precisely in minde, and ballancing with vnaffectioned thoughts the state of the difference betwixt vs, and beholding the naked pourtrature of the thing it selfe without shadow of circumstances, I perceived that the great prolixitie and the too exceeding breuitie of the Romane hilloriographers could not well be concred with the yeile of any reasonable excuse: and further the objection of others could not well be confined who do condemne in their writings great diffagreament and contrariety of narration, wherefore remembring my first intent in the collecting of these historicall reports, which was to fingle and sequester the vndeniable truth of the historie from the drosse and falshood which was' in many places intermixed and enfolded in it; and to do this in fuch fort, that my speciall care in auoyding the extremities of length and breuity, two lothsome faults, from which not withstanding few writers be free, might fully and manifestly appeare and confidering likewise that histories are now in speciall

ROWDEN, Classify - Africans Money Sobs

request

TO THE READER.

request and accompt, whereat I greatly reloyce, acknowledging them to be the teachers of vertuous life, good conversation, discreete behaulour, politike gouernement, conucnient enterptifes, aduifed proceedings, warie defences, grounded experience, and refined wisedome. And being again solicited by perswalible meanes, to commit the censure of this my historical collection to the curtesie of others, I have atlast yeelded to this motion, reposing my selfe rather vpon kinde construction, then rigorous deserr, The vse of this historie is threefold, first the renealing of the mischieses of discord and civill discention, in which the innocent are proferibed for their wealth, noblemen dishonored, cities become waste by banishment and bloodshed : nay (which is more) virgins are deflowred, infants are taken out of their parents armes, and put to the sword, matrons do fuffer villanie, temples and houses are spoyled, and euery place is full of armed men, of carcasses, of bloud, of teares. Secondly the opening of the cause hereof, which is nothing else but ambition, for out of this feed groweth a wholeharuest of cuils. Third. ly the declaring of the remedie, which is by humble estimation of our selues, by living well, nor by lurking well: by converling in the light of the common weale with equals, not by complotting in darke conventicles against superiors: by contenting our selues with our lot, and not contending to our losse: by hoping without aspiring, and by suffering without conspiring. Let Rome in this history be a witnesse, that a slipperie ascending was alwaies accompanied, with a headlong diffent, and that peace is a great deale better then triumph, which will be an occasion I trust to my countreymen of England to be thankfull to God for this sweete quiet and serenitie of this flourishing estate, in which England now standeth, wherein the day striueth with the night whether shall be calmer : and let it mooue thee who focuer thouart, courteous Reader, to pray with the earnest endeuer of thy hart, that the Iris which is the pledge of our peace may still thine amongst vs, that the happie Virgin which is the starre of safety in the Zodiacke of this common weale may continue immoueable, that our Haleyon may still sit in this Albion, on this white rocke to make the feas calme, and the waves filent, and to preserve the league of heatten and earth, I meane true Religion amongst vs. From my Chamber in Graies Inne 13. Octob. Anno Dom. 1600.

TO THE READER.

Thine in all sincere affection,
WILLIAM FULBECKE.

A Table of the Romaine forenames written with one letter.

A. Aulus.

C. Caius.

D. Decimus: for Decimi it cannot be, because that was the name of a familie, and in the monuments of the Greeke writers, it is written strupes and not struct.

L. Lucius.

M.M. Marcus Manius.

N. Numerius.

P. Publius.

Q. Quintus.

T. Titus.

Written with two letters.

Ap. Appius.

Cn. Cneus.

Op. Opiter.

Sp. Spurius. Ti. Tiberius.

Written with three letters.

Mam. Mamercus.

Sex. Sextus.

Ser. Sernius.

Tul. Tullus.

The names of the bookes and Authors out of which this historic was derived.

Appianus.
Augustinus.
Cassiodorus.
Casar.
Cicero.
Dio Niceus & Dio Cassius.
Eutropius.
Florus.
Gellius.
Gentilis Albericus.

Hirtius. Iornandes.

Iosephus.

Liber de virus illustribus.

Liber antiquitatum Romanarum.

Libri gentium & familiarum Romanarum.

Liuius.

Lucanus.

Manutius Paulus.

Obsequeus. Orosius.

Plinius.

Pedianus.

Plutarchus.

Salustius.

Seneca. Sigonius.

Strabo.

Velleius

Valerius Maximus.

ZOMATAS.

CLOTHO,

Or the first booke.

Hen vainglorious Tarquine Tarquinbanified,
the last of the Romaine kings for the shamefull rape 3) of Lucrece committed by one of his fonnes, was bani-thed from Rome & Confuls fucceeded, which as the name declares, had charge of prouiding for the comon safetie & securitie, the Romaines changed gold for brasse, and loathing one king suffered manie tyrants, scourging their follie with their fall, and curing a feltred fore with a poiloned plaister: for what could be more vniust; or more contrarie to the free estate of a citie, then to Subject the whole common weale to the rule ofmanie potentates, and to exclude the people from all right and interest in publique affaires? VV hat could be more abfurd then the

Senators onely to bestow the Consulship, the foueraigntie in warres, the supremacie in superstitious offices, according to their fancie and affection, to call Senates at their pleasure, to conuocate affemblies when it seemed best for their owne profite, and to have power of life and death vpon the bodies of their fellow citizens,&the people to live like their slaves, being barred and restrained from marrying with the daughter of anie Senatour, as if that pray had bene too high for so low a wing, and being held in such disdaine and disreputation that common fellowship and mutual societie was denied them, which was indeede not to liue like free men in a citie, but like villaines and bondmen in a wainfcot prison, and like fillie birds in a golden cage: but when after long experience they had found, that winter succeeded sommer, & that the withered welfare of their citie could not be revived without some fortunate spring: to the intent that moderation might be induced, and that the meaner fort might beare some stroke with the mightier, that the people might enjoy the sweete of the citic as well as the fathers, they procured procured a new office entituled the Tribunethip, whereby they might protect themselues as with a shield against the arrogant endeuors and outragious decrees of the Senatours, and the the fellowship of mariage was brought in with the Senate, which before was prohibited the people, as if they had bene stained with some cotagious iandise, or infected with some dangerous leprosie, and their suffrage was the made necessarie to the election of officers, which before was as rare in that comon-weale as a white skin in Æthiopia. The people hauing thus creced their power, did by degrees more and more enhance it, till by many alterations it was turned from an Aristocracie, from the rule of them that were manie and mightie, to a plaine and visible Democracie or estate popular, administred by the voyces of the multitude and magistrates, and by the vnited consent of the whole corporatio. Now when the people had by continuall incrochments assumed and seased into their handes the giuing and bestowing of the greater offices, as the Confulship, that strong tower of the Senatous authoritie, and besides that the e will i

Dictatorship, the Censorship, the warlike Empire, the priestly dignitic, and many other most excellent honors, which before did solely belong to the Peeres of Rome, and now there wanted nothing to make their power equall, but onely that Plebiscites, that is, decrees made by the people, should binde the greaterpowers, as well as the people themfelues, fro which at that time the whole companie of the Nobles were exempted. Therefore to make them generall, and of like force against all, they wrested from the fathers after much businesse, the law Hortensia, by which it was enacted that in euery important matter the people should be equally interested with the Senate, and that the lawes so made and ratified by them, should stretch as well to the Senators, as to the people themselues. After that the common-weale was brought to this good and temperate constitution, many profitable lawes were established, many victories followed, many cities bowed vnto them, manie monarchies sued for their fauour, manie tyrants feared their puissance, & manie countreys dreaded their inuation. I hen there flourished

the world, whose great magnanimitie & wifedome in the tumult of warres, together with their singular temperance, and loyaltie in the calme of peace, is to be wondred at of all, and of all to be reuerenced. But when either the Senate or people did passe the lists and limits of aquall regiment, the ancient and vertuous orders of the citie were immediatly troden under foote, and their good and laudable customes were encountred and put to flight by dissolute and unbridled enormities: then the Asiaticall triumphs did incorporate into the citie a womanish wantonnesse, then proude ambition mounted her plume of disdaine vppon the top of the Capitolle, then their excelfine pride and ionissance for their victories had against Pyrrhus, for their coquest of Carthage, for the ouerthrow of Philip, Perseus,

16.33

Antiochus, mightie kings, for the winning of Spaine, Sicilie, Sardinia, Illyria, Macedonia and Greece, being as yet fresh in their memories, were as bellowes to puffe vp their swelling humours. The there succeeded a dismall discord, which beginning when the estate was at the highest, did not end or expire, till it fell to the lowest ebbe, sticking fast in the sands of a grieuous desolation. If a man will retrospe-Cliuely measure the space of former times, & the whole compasse of yeares, wherein the fortunes of the Romanes were by God his hand turned about, he shall finde that all the weight of their affaires, before the incohation of the Empire of Augustus, may be dispersed into fixe ages; wherof the first containing the number of fistie yeares, was spent in the making of a towne; for that gorgeous seate which Rome built. nowe we call Rome, was then but a plot of ground, to which houses were wanting, but afterward a great multitude of Latine & Tufcane shepheards, together with Phrygians & Arcadians, flowing to that place, as to a temple reuerenced by pilgrims and trauellers, the common-weale was compacted of these se-

ucrall

uerall people, as a bodie of diverse elements. Romulus the founder of their citie & empire, did delight wholly in mountaines, rivers, woods, marishes and wastes, playing perhaps the espiall, to discouer and find out in what place it were best to erect a citie, and how to conuey things necessarie vnto it, and how to adorne it with continual increment and addition of demeisnes; to such imaginations the fields and places desolate were most accordant, and to his fauage societie this practise of life was most acceptable.

The fecond age which chalengeth other fiftie yeares, did ingender in them working spirits and lostie cogitations, which eneagred and inflamed their mindes, against the confiners & borderers: then it first began to beare the countenance and shape of a kingdome, which was after enlarged to the shore of the Midland and Adriaticke seas, which they rather vsed as bridges to other nations, then as bounders to their owne.

The third age whose steps were an hundred and fiftie yeares, was the crowne and confummation of their kingdome, in which whatfoeuer was done was done by the for the pompe, glorie and magnificence of that estate : as yet the Romane pride was in her blade, and in the tendernesse of her minoritie, this threefold age was spent under seuen kings, differing by fatall providence in the disposition of their nature, as the frame and condition of that common-weale did especially require: for who was euer more fierce and ardent then Romulus ea. Romulus? Such a one they needed to inuade the kingdomes of others. VVho more religious then Numa? Such the time did aske, that the furie of the people might be mitigated by the scare of God: VVherefore was Tullus an ar- Tullus that artificiall champion given vito tificiall Cap- them? That he might sharpen their valour by them? That he might sharpen their valour by his wit. VV herefore Aucus the great builder? greatbuilder That he might extend their citie with colonies, ioyne it together with bridges, enuiron it with walles. The ornaments, ensignes and Tarquinius his ornamets braueries of Tarquinius, did with rayes of Servius tax. dignitie illustrate and decore that estate. Sercih the Rouius taxing them by polles, brought to passe that the Romane commo-weale might know herriches. And the importune domination of proud

gious.

manesby

polics.

proud Tarquine did verie much profite, for Proud Tarquine oceathe people afflicted by iniuries, did force a figure of lipassage to their libertie.

The fourth age was as it were the youth of the Romane monarchie, when the flower of their prowesse being greene, and the bloud of their mindes blossoming in their faces and armes, the thepheardly fauagenesse did as yet breathe foorth the reliques of an undaunted stomacke. Then flourished these Romane hazards, and miracles Cocles, Sceuola, Cloætia, which chronicles do therefore witnesse, that posteritie may wonder. Then were the Tuscanes repulsed and the Latines and Volscias daily and deadly enemies, vanquished by the triumphant husbandman L. Quintius Cin-The speedie cinnatus, which war he ended within fifteene war of Cindayes, as if he had made hast to returne to his cinnatus. tillage. Then were ouercome the Vientines, the Faliscians, and the Fidenates: then the Galles a couragious nation, vsing their bodies for armour, in all respects so terrible, that they might seeme to be borne for the death of men, and destruction of cities, were vtterly vanquished: then were ouercome the

The praise of Capania.

Sabines and Samnites wasting and dispoiling the fields of Campania, being the goodliest plot, the Diamond-sparke and the hony-spot of all Italie: there is no land more temperate for aire, for it hath a double spring-tide: no foile more fertile, and therfore it is called the combat of Bacchus & Ceres, no region more hospitable in regard of the sea, here be the noble hauens Caieta, Misenus, & the healthfull bathes Lucrine and Auerne, the resting places of the sea. Here the mountaines clad with vines Gaurus, Falernus, Massitus, and the firie hill Vesurius: here the famous citie Capua third fifter to Rome and Carthage doth imperiously stand. They begire Samniu with warre and bloud on all sides, till they had ruinated her verie ruines, and reuilled in her bowels, and twelve seuerall nations of Tuscana waging hote and furious battell against them, in such fort and terrible maner, as if darts had bene throwne at the Romans from the coulds, were likewise suppressed. In this

Pyrrhus figh age happened the Tarentine warre, in which ting against the armie of Pyrrhus continually slaying was continually slaine, and reuenge did liue in the death

death of the Romanes: so that Pyrrhus did thinke him selse to be borne under Hercules his starre, who having cut off the seuen heads of Hydra, seuen other did spring vp. But from this Captaine the Romanes plucked such spoiles, that neuer fairer were caried in triumph. For before this day nothing passed in triumph, but the heards of the Volscian cattell, and the flocks of the Sabine sheepe, the broken wagons of the Gaules, & the crushed harnesse of the Samnites: but in this triumph, if you respect the prisoners, they were Molossians, Thessalians, Macedonians, Brutians, Apulians, Lucans: if you regard the pompe, it was gold, purple, curious pictures, tablets, and the delights of Tarentum. Next to this was the victorie of the Pisani and Salentini: this age shewed her force the space of two hundred and fistie yeares.

Then followed the fifth age, in which the bodie of the common weale grew to great strength, the joints and sinewes being by mature soliditie setled in sirme estate. Therefore the conquering nation having now attained to the verie manhood of manlinesse, and displayed her standerd round about the sides of Italie, to the skirts of the sea, pawsed a litle, as a great scalefire, which consuming all the woods and groues in the way that it goeth, is abrupted and put out of course by a floud coming betweene. But soone after seeing a rich pray on the other side of the sea, supposing it to be a peece of gold pulled from her masse; they did so vehemently desire the same, that because it could not be joyned ynto their dominion by bridges for the interruption of the sea, therefore they resolued to ioyne it by fword and battell: and so was Sicilia subdued by the Romanes, which was the cause and originall of the first Carthaginian warre, which the warres of the Ligurians, Insubrians and The begin-ning of the fecond Cur-thaginian warre, so dangerous and bloudie to thiginawer. the Romanes, that if a man compare the losse of both nations, they which did conquer, were more like to persons conquered. For it grieued that noble brood, and valiant people of Carthage to be abridged of the sea, deprined of the llands, to pay tribute, and to vndergo not onely the bridle, but the yoke: to this age

must

must be ascribed the circuit of one hundred yeares, which may be termed the golden age of the Romanes, & the first age in which they shewing their streamers on each side of the Ocean, did transport their warres into all nations of the world, in whose yeares the Romanes were honest, religious, just, sincere, vertuous, and dutifull.

The fixt age containing 120, yeares was troublesome and vgly, bloudie & detestable, vices growing with their Empire. For with the wars valiantly fought against lugurtha, & Mithridates, against the Carthaginians, Cimbrians, Parthians, Galles & Germanes, by which the Romane glorie ascended and pierced the skie, the civill flaughters of the Gracchi, and of Drusus, of Marius, Sylla and others were mingled and enterlarded: how mournefull a spectacle was it, that they fought the same time with fellowes in league, with fellowes in the citic, with bondmen, with fencers; all the Senate afterward contending and being in hurliburly with it selfe? These received of the other ages an exquisite commo weale; as it were a curious picture, which after mil-dring and decaying by age, they did not only neglect to renew, with the same colours, but they also forgot to preserve the outwarde forme and lineaments thereof, for what remained of the auncient maners, which were both vnused and vnknowne: for by their recent vices they lost the common-weale in fact, and in name retained it. How lamentable was the face of things at that instant? when eueric man confusedly being found in the field, in the streetes, in townes, in houses, in highwaies, in markets, in temples, in beds, sitting at the table or in the porch, was suddenly and sauagely murdered? what howlings were there of them that died? what teares of them that lived, and beheld this? The cause of these miseries was too great prosperitie. VVhat made the people so earnest to extort the lawes of fields and corne, but verie famine procured by riot on the one part, and couetousnesse on the other? for such was the lauish mif-spending, & excessive vianding of some, that it can hardly be defined, whether more did perish by the blade or by the banquet, and such againe was the couctousnesse, & greedie exacting exacting of others, that none can indicially decide, whether the Romanes were more endamaged by the enemie in time of warre, or by the vourer in peaceable seasons. Hence grew the two civil broiles of the Gracchi, and that of Saturninus being the third, and that of Drusus being the fourth, who maintained the Senate against the Knights: and for the further abetting and auow of this quarell, he promifed the freedome of the Citie to diverse Italians animated to this attempt, so that in one Citic there was as much discord as in two seuerall campes. This bred the Italian warre, The Italian warre, warre, because promise was not persourmed. And next ensued the warre of Mithridates, seeing Mithridates the Romans on each side intangled with gar-the Romans. boiles, which presently bred the enmitte betwixt Marius and Sylla, when Marius would haue deuested Sylla of his Generalship giuen The contenhim by the Senat for the oppugnation of Mi-tion betwitt thridates. These two gaue Mithridates enco- sylla. ragement, by leauing the ribbes of the comweale naked and open vnto him, Marius led anarmie, ambition led Marius: ambition I fay ingendred by riches, did raise contention betwixt them: from this the warre of Sertorius and Pompey had his originall, whereof the one was proscribed by Sylla, the other protected. For Pompey was accompted Syllaes minion or fauorite, whom he therefore called Magnus, that him selfe might seeme greater, being the Saint whom Pompey ferued. Sylla was cruell in reuenging crueltie, and his medicine was worse then the maladie The diffention of Lepidus tion of Lepidus dus and Catulus, whereof the one would have ratified, the other reversed, all the acts of Sylla.

C

Syllaes indulgence brought to beggerie, op-

Catilines re. Then Catiline whom his lust occasioned by Cæfarcanor brooke it.

posed him selfe to the Consuls. Then Pompey Pompey: posed him selfe to the Consuls. Then Pompey: great dignity entred the lists, as a follower of Sylla, who obtained excellent dignitie in these times, but civill, and such as the regular course of that common weale did affoord, whose power & authoritie Cæ ar could not tollerate, because he could not match it; which not with standing he being ouercome and slaine, Cæsar passed and transcended. But when this yourper had bleached the floore of the Senate house with his owne bloud, who before had ouerflowed and

and deluged the whole world, with the crimfon goare of most admirable men, the common-weale did seeme to have rolled her selfe into the state of her pristinate libertie, and it had returned vnto the fame, if either Pompey had not left sonnes, or Cæsar had not made an heire, or, which was worse, if Antonius the thunder-dart of furie had not furnised, being once colleague with Cæfar in the Confulfhip, now fuccessor of his vsurpation. But while Pompeys sonne striueth for the honor of the name, the sea ratleth with armour: whilest Octavius revegeththe death of his adoptive father, Thessalie is againe made the basis of tents and pauillions, and all Europe and Affricke groneth vnder the weight of iron, whilest Antonius in the habit of his mind diverse and discoloured, doth either disdaine Octauius or doate voon Cleopatra, whose beautie if he could have exceeded by his chastitie, his shame should not have blazed like a beacon at this day in the eyes of posteritie, but he had won the garlad of coquest, not meriting more then triumph. The armie of Octavius having flaine Pompeis sonne, did in him slay enmity,

the former

and Cassius being ouercome by fight, Brutus by despaire, they did extirpate faction. Yet Antonius not chalenging part with anie, but principalitie ouerall, imagining that he wanted no kingly thing faue onely a kingdome, remained as a rocke or gulfe in the mouth of the haue, whom he with some labor subdued. And, as in the yearely conversion of the heauens, it commeth to passe, that the starres iogged together do murmure and threaten tempest, so with the alteration of the Romane state, before Octavius founded his Monarchie, the whole globe of the earth with ciuill and forraine warre, with fight on sea and land was terribly shaken. But the accidents and occurrences of these last hundred and twentie yeares, in the sequele of this historie shall be, if God fauour these lines, more particularly & distinctly reported. The first that made the The valor of Romanes mightie was the former Scipio that scourged Affrica with continuall warres and vexations, and in the end subdued it: the first that made them wanton and effeminate, was the later Scipio, by whom Carthage was sub-

Scipio. of the later uerted, yet not by his fault, but by the casualty Scipio.

of the time. For when the riuall and enuious ielousic of the Carthaginian glory, was by his matchlesse victorie finally determined, the The Romans made water Romanes did sodainly degenerate, and with by prosperity an hungrie gorge fed on the poisonfull baites of bitter sweete ambition, following wantons like wildehorses, and addicted to pleasure as their onely paragon, the auncient gouernement of the Citie was vtterly forfaken, the watchings of the campe were ended vpon beds of downe, their heavie armour was turned to light and fashionable attire, and the wonted bufinesse of the Citie was chaunged into idlenesse. Then did Scipio Nasica build porches in the Capitolle, then did Metellus threaten the heaves with haughtie buildings, the did Cn. Octavius crect a most sumptuous forefront, & then did the riot of the Comons imitate the magnificence of the nobles. In the middest of this delicate iolitie, when the Romanes were now in the ruffe of their pride, a grieuous and despitefull warre was raised in Spaine by Viriathus of Lustrania, a notable Viriathus on theefe & ringleader to a multitude of rogues, Romanes. which hong a long time in suspence: but in the couine then courage of Seruilius Capio, a greater danger enfued, namely the warre of The Numan the Numantines. The citie of Numantia did neuer affoord armour to any more, then ten thousand citizens at one battell; but either through the fiercenesse of their nature, or the default of the Romane captaines, or the indulgence of fortune, they brought Pompey the first of the Pompeys that was Consull, a mã of note & fame to most shameful leagues, & Mancinus Hostilius, to a detestable truce,

Arange leagues by the Numantines.

breaking

mace.

which vpon a remorce of minde, and change of opinion, against the law of Armes, and to the great discredit of the Romanes, he afterward broke: but Pompey escaped vnpunished The punish by fauour, Mancinus was punished by shame. For he was caried and transported by the Rocinus for mane Heraulds vnto the Numantines, his hands being manacled, and so was delivered vp into the enemies power, whom they refufed to receive, faying that a publique breach of promise was not to be punished by the bloud of one man. This yeelding vp of Mancinus into the enemies hands, did cause in the

citie

citic a perillous and pernitious dissension.

For Ti. Gracchus the sonne of the right noble of the Gracchus. man Ti. Gracchus, whose mother was the chus. daughter of Scipio Affricanus, by whose meanes and authority that reprochful league was made, taking it grieuously that any thing which he did should be discountenanced and fearing himselfe the danger either of the like punishment or of the like judgement, being at that time Tribune of the people, in life in The praise of nocent, in wit pregnant, and in purpose guiltlesse: and surthermore adorned with so great vertues, as either nature could affoord or industrie could perfect, or mans frailtie could containe. P. Mutius Scauola, and L. Calphur Gracehus nius being Confuls fell from vertue to vice, Gracehus and extreme villanie; and having promised venue. vpon a dissolute fancie, that he would enfranchise and receiue into the Citie anie Italian whosoeuer, turned all things into a contrarie state, mingled vertues with vice, lawes with lust, and brought the common-weale into an headlong and hideous danger. Octavius his fellow in office, who stood against him for the A Trevirate comongood, he put from his place, & created first made in Rome.

THE FIRST BOOKE

a new state in Rome entitled a Treuirate or Triarchie, that is the rule of three men, who were called Treuiri, him self for one, his father in law Appius who had bin Coful for another of Scipio Na. and C. Gracchus his brother for the third. At that time flourished P. Scipio Nasica, nephew to him, who was judged of the Senate in his lifetime to be the best of the Romanes, sonne to that Scipio who purchased great praise for his good demeanor in the Cenforship, nephew two degrees remoued to Cn. Scipio a man highly commended, vncle to Scipio Æmilianus whose commendation lieth in his name: this Scipio Nasica thogh he were nearly linked in kindred to Tiberius Gracehus, yet preferring his countrey before his kinschio Nafi-dred, thinking nothing privately comodious which was not publikly convenient, standing in the higher part of the Capitolle, exhorted all the Romanes, which desired the safetie of the common-weale, to follow him, vpo which words the Nobles, the Senate, and the greater and better part of the Romane knights did runne suddenly vpon Gracchus, standing in the floore of the Capitolle with his adherets, and

and even then conspiring with a frequent afsemblie of new-come Italians, he thereupon flying and running downe the hil whereupon the Capitolle was founded, his head being crushed as he was running downe, with a fragment of one of the boordes which was in the Senate house, did sodainly end his life, which flame. he might have enjoyed with great honor and quietnesse.

This broile and haplesse dissention was the first conspiracy in which civil bloud was shed, and the first dispensation of drawing swordes within the walles: after that time right was oppressed by violence, and the mightier man was accompted the better, the quarels of citizens that were wont to be cured by compromise and agreement, were now decided by fword and bloudthed, and warres were not followed according to the goodnesse of the cause, but according to the greatnesse of the pray. But it was no maruell, though this small beginning had so great effect, and this odious faction fo vnfortunate consequence, for examples do not pawfe there where they begin, but being once received into a narrow strair,

Gracchus,

they make way to themselues, raunging and spreading themselves over the bodie of the world, and when men go once aftray, they mind not how farre they go, thinking that nothing can procure dishonestie to them, which hath brought profite to others.

Scipiotaketh Numantia.

VVhilest these things were done in Italie, Scipio Affricanus of the house of Æmilius, who destroyed Carthage, after many slaughters of his enemies in the Numantine warre, being nowe againe made Confull, was sent Scipiois sent backe into Spaine, where his courage and fuccesse did match and æquall his valure and fortune in Affricke, and within a yeare and three moneths after his comming thither, he tooke Numantia, and caused euerie stone to be throwne to the ground, as a notable monument of a Romane victorie. There was neuer anieman of anie name or nation, that by the facking of cities did more æternise his house or enlarge his glorie: for having rooted vp Carthage, he deliuered the Romanes from feare, and having razed Numantia, he deliuered them from reproch. Being returned into the Citie within a short time, after two

two Consulships, two victories, and two notable triumphs, he was found dead in his bed, scipio found his iaw bone being dissoluted and dislocated. bed. bed. There was no inquisition made afterward of the death of this inuincible Captaine: the bodie of Scipio was brought out into the atrecte scipios body is brought his head couered, by whose great labours and out into the warlike exploits, Rome lifted vp her head ouer all the world, to the terrour and difmay of other cities and countreys. His death was, as the most say fatall, as some say conspired : his life doubtlesse was of that singularitie, that it was ouercome of no mans glorie, but onely his grandfathers . comic & Marchanie.

After the death of Ti. Gracehus, the same fury and rage of mind that possess him, entred a rebell to as it were by a kind of transmutation into his the state. brother C. Gracchus, a man as like to Tiberius in his vertues as in his errour, who when with great facilitie and case of mind he might haue benethe Prince of the Citie and the ruler of the Senare, tooke the Tribuneship vpon him to raise tumults, to licence swords, and to reuiue discord, to no other intent or purpose but either to reuenge his brothers death, or purchase to himselfe a soueraigntie, and for tand a partie more haltie parting of his drift he be-Rowed the freedome of the Citie vpon cuery inhabitant of Italy: he interdicted and forbad by Tribunitial law, that no citizen should posselfemorethen fluehundred akers of land, he The fedition or office when havenes he filled the provinces

C. Gracchus, with new colonies, he transferred the authoritic of judgement fro the Senate to the Nobless he determined to distribute and deuide come amongst the people: to be briefe, he left almost nothing vnaltered or vndisturbed. This man was flaine by the sharpe and hastie pursuite of L. Opimius Consull who was in armes against him; and Fullius Placeus was arebellious likewise flaine, one that had enjoyed both the Confulling and the honor of Triumphia man of a derestable awaning, whom O. Gracehus

Senatour : Saine.

the Treuiri in the place of Tiberius his brotherebeing his affortate in all his enterprifes, and defiled with the like diffionest intendopimius his ments. Opimius caused proclamation to be proclamatio made that who locuer could bring vinto him the head of Oracolius, thould have the weight

had denominated and defigned to be one of

of the head in gold. Flaceus inciting his foldiers on the hill Auentine, was there flaine, together with his eldest sonne. C. Gracchus comitting himselfe to flight lest he might fall into the hands of them who Opimius had sent to take him, putting his bare necke vnder the C Gracchus naked sword of his seruant Euporus; was of beheaded. him beheaded: and the fame Euporus was fuddenly a flaughter-man to himselfe. Thus the two Gracchi finished the course of their life, men that had a fortunate beginning, sinister proceedings, & a cursed ending, to whom if they had embraced quietnesse, the commoweale wold have offered these honors, which by tumult and disquietnesse they sought, their mother Cornelia as yet liuing, a vertuous and learned Ladie; who having nurtured and trai- Cornelia la-mentelh her ned them vp in the studie of learning and very children. tuous demeanour, did greatly bewaile , that her good endeuors had so bad successe; and that her two fonnes, whom nature protended to be the solace of her age, were so lodainely and shamefully difgraced, that she could not fee their bodies couered with earth, they being in most despitefull maner throwne into

Tiber, whose mindes she had surnished and beautified with such exceller learning, so was her ioy ouercome and surprised with griefe, that she must either loath her children, or else lament for them, but howsoeuer, for euer lacke them.

C. Marius taketh luguitha by Sylla his micanes.

n In that tract of time C. Marius waging battaile in Numidia against lugurtha, who were both fellow fouldiers and managed armes together vnder Scipio Affricanus, sent L. Sylla his Qualtor to Bocchus the King of the Mores; to treate and capitulate with him about the taking of lugurth, whom by that means he enjoyed, and being made the fecond time Confull, in the beginning of his Consulship and in the Calends of January, he brought lugurth in triumph to Rome. The Cimbrians & Teutons at that time did cause great flaughter and manie massacres of the Romanes in France, and having put to flight and discomfited Cæpio, Manlius, Carbo, and Silanus, they killed in fight Scaurus Aurelius one of the Confuls; and other excellent men of memorable qualities. The people of Rome did not thinke anie Generall so fit to encounter these foes as C. Marius: & whilest he was in these warres, he was continually Consull, his third Consulhip he spent in warlike pre-C. Marius his third Conparation, thinking it not sufficient to have sulfied Co souldiers, but to haue practised and skilfull fouldiers, training them by pettie skirmishes, and encouraging the by the conquest of base townes, to more haughtie and valorous attempts: his fourth Consulship was spent a-Hit fourth Consulship. bout the warres of Sextus, where he fought with the Teutons: and before that warre finished, he razed out of the world the whole progenie of the Teutons. In his fifth Confulfhip His fifth Cohe planted his fight betwixt the Alpes and fulling. Rome, and in that battell Marius him self being Confull, and Q. Catulus Proconful, a fortunate victorie enfued, farre beyond the ex-Marius his pectation of the Romanes, and the admira-ric which he tion of strangers, an hundred thousand men had against the Cimbribeing brought into the power of the Romans ins. wherof some were flaine & some were flaues. By this victorie Marius deserved, that Rome should not repent her selfe of his birth, nor requite his acts with reproch. His fixth Conful-C. Marius his fixth Conship was giue him as the crowne of his merits, fulhip.

ter

yet he is not to be defrauded of the glorie, which during this Confullhip did of right belong vnto him, euen by the confession of the enuious. Marius being the fixt time Conful, Saturninus a broacher of Saturninus one of the Tribunes of the people, did promulgate a lawe, that what lands or demesnes Marius had gained in France by his expulsion of the Cimbrians from thence, should be equally parted & deuided amongst the people of Rome, and that every Senator should sweare to this, thinking to bind them by their oath from dispossessing and disseising the people of these alotmets and purparties. Q. Merellus Q. Metellus a Senator, against whom Satur-himselse a. ninus had a burning standard whom Saturninushada burning stomacke, denied to rageinst Satur-tifie that lawe by oath, wherupon he had day giuen him to appeare before the Senate. For Marius being wholly addicted to please the people in all things, which did not oppugne his owne profite, did greatly fauour the law. Metellus though he were supported in this a. ction by many good and vertuous citizens, Metellus co. yet fearing some bloudshed in the citie by felse to vo luntarie ba maintaining that cause, committed himselse nifiment to voluntarie exile, and shortly after water & fire was forbidden him, which was the title & stile of the banishment vsed in Rome. This Saturninus was afterward made the third time Tribune, and because he seared that C. Memmius, who at that time fued for the Cofulfhip, would with maine force oppose himselse to his actions and enterprises, he gathe saturninus reda garrison of souldiers, and caused him to cause him to Memmius beslaine. Marius presently rowzing himselseto be slaine. for the punishmet and revenge of this proud Tribune, and by Senate-councell authorised, * charged his bodie with harnesse, and with a troupe of warlike citizens besieged the Capi-c, Marius toll, which Saturninus and the Prætor Glan-besiegeth cias, together with Saufeius the Quæstor his adherents did hold as the castle of their de. fence. But Marius cutting in peeces the conduit pipes, enforced them to yeeld, and to submit themselues promising the life, living, putteth the and libertie; but when he had them in his po-conspirators wer, he made hauocke of them all leauing not one aliue; the house of Saturninus he razed saturninus from the lowest foundation. VVhen the con-Broyed by spiracie of Saturninus was appealed, there began offresh a new quarest betwiet the Se-

Marius fa-noureth the lawe of Saturninus.

fire 2)1019 fortune of

Drufus,

nators and M.Liuius Drusus a noble Gentleman, eloquent and modest, nature being as bountifull vnto him, as fortune was injurious; he had alwayes a great desire to restore the former honor to the Senate, and to transferre the iudiciall power from the Nobles: for they being possess of that authoritie by the law of C.Gracchus, which is about mentioned, did practife extreme and brutish crueltie vppon manie excellent Senators and guiltlesse Citizens, and amongst the rest was slaine P. Rutilius, a man in that age incomparable: yet the fortune of Drusus was such, that he was crossed and confronted by the Senate, in those matters which hemoued for the good & behoose of the Senate, they either not perceiuing, or not willing to perceive, that though the peritions which Drusus made as Tribune, and as of dutie he ought, founded and indeed tended to the profite of the people, yethis. drift to be this, that the people having leffer things graunted them, might permit greater to the Senate, that so giving them a litle the reyne, they might enion the fruite of libertie, but yet might eafily be plucked in if there were anie feare of disorder: which was the onely meane to preserve the dignitie of the Senate, and to restraine the humours of the people, but the eyes of the Senators were fo dazeled with enuie toward Drusus, with enmitie toward the people, and selfe-love toward their owne persons, that they did more allow the pernitious practifes of the other Tribunes, then the dutifull meaning of Drufus: despising the reverence wher with Drusus did alwayes hondur them, and yet digesting the iniuries wher with his fellow Tribunes did molest them: which vniust and absurd dealing did enidently proceed from the gall of their enuie. Then this good Tribune having his mind surcharged with malcontentment, seeing that his honest purpose was maliciously peruerted, lacking patiece to beardhis griefe, and constancie to perseuere in his commendable intents, resolued sodainly in a desperat passion to maintaine the faction of the Gracchi, to entertaine into his heart rebellion, to swarue from vertues to prostrate himselfe to the violence of fortune, and being garded with a great multitude of vnknowne foldiers,

were

Drufus is " flaine.

who were seditious Italians, whom Drusus laboured to make free men of the Estate, he thought to terrifie the citie, but within a short time he was slaine in his owne porch, his side being pierced with a knife, which sheathed in his entrailes, and was left there sticking and filling the mouth of the wound, but when he yeelded up to the heavens his vitall spirit, casting his eyes upon the companie that stoode abouthim, & lamenting that difmall chance, he breathed our these words ar the last instant » and with the furrender of his foule: Tell me » my friends and kinsfolke, may the common-» weale at any time enjoy a more faithfull citi-"zen, then I haue heretofore bene? This ende of life had that noble Gentleman, who if he had bene armed with patience, might have C.Marins in triumphed ouer enuy. Caius Marius was now high reputa- become the refuge and defender both of Senate and people: he was of bodie hardfauor red, in maners rigorous, famous for warre, & odious in peace, vulatiable in ambirious defires, impatient in his wrath, and alwayes attempting some strange noueltie : he did not long after valiantly endeuor to suppresse the flames flames and perillous scalefire of the Italian warre, which because it was most dangerously: begun and continued, & with great difficultie quenched and ended, I thinke it not amisse to make full description thereof, laying for my foundation the cause which moved the Italians or Latinesto revolt from the Romans, and to breake their faith before constantly kept. But the causes of things are so secret & misticall, being the most remote objects, to which our vnderstanding may aspire, that we may easily be deceived by disguised and pretenced reasons, whilest we seeke for the true and essential causes. For to report things that be done it is casio, because the eye and the tongue may dispatch it, but to discouer and vnfold the causes of things, requireth braine, soule, and the best prowesse of man's nature, wherefore to find out the causes of this warre, diligence must be vsed. This warre is of diuerse men diuersly named, some terme it the Italian, some the Marsian, some the Sociall war: all which have sufficient reason to make good their seuerall appellations. The Italian warre it was tearmed, because it was raised by fuch Italians, as were in league with the Roll manes; which was the occasion of the entercourse of manie good turnes and benefits betwixtthem and the Romanes: for though they did notinion the liberties of the city of Rome in such large and ample maner, as the citizens or free men of that Citie , yet they possessed them in farre greater measure, then others which were meere straungers to that Estato, and that by the law of societie, which to the Romanes was alwayes facred and inuiolate: this warre therfore vpon their reuolt was termed Sociale, as maintained by them who had contracted & established a league of societie. The Italian The Marsian war it was called, because the first tempted by commotion was attempted by the Marsians, a the Marsians free people of Italie. The cause & the beginning of this war do in time greatly differ, for the cause hath a retrospect to the first times of the Romane monarchie, when the people of Italie being greatly infested and endamaged by the continuall inuasions of the Romanes, did watch oportunitie, and with ferious expe-Cation attended; if by anie possible meanes they might requite the Romanes with the like.

37

like, and recouer their auncient rights and iurisdictions, and at one instant breake both the league and shake off the feare which they then had of the Romanes, and which was the last marke of their enterprise, rather comaund then condition with the Romanes. But as there is no euill without excuse, and no prætence without some colour of reason, and no wiles can be wanting to malicious & wrangling wits , therefore an occasion was fought for, whereby peace might be dissoluted, and discord warranted. Here now appeareth the error wherein Drusus was intangled. For they made him an instrument or lure to draw vnro them the free vse of the Romane liberties, which in truth they did neither greatly defire, nor strongly hope for, but they looked for a repulse; and thought that would be a good occasion to ground their tumults vpon, and as it were a vaile for their leud endeuours: whereby it is euident that as the cause of this warre is ancient, fo the beginning thereof is The repulse to be referred to the repulse of Drusus, which of Dusting beginning of beginning of happened fixe hundred fixtie and two yeares the Italian after the building of Rome. These commo-warre-

F

of Italie.

at their felliual meetings to joyne their heads and hands together, and fo to proceed to the Citie, there to worke the death of the two Confuls Sex. Iulius Cæsar, and Martius Philippus: but this matter being discouered, they did presently put to death Seruilius Procon-Proconfull flaine by the full, who was fent vnto them at the first beginning of their stirres, by peaceable & reasonablemeanes to appeale and determine them, and all the other Romanes which were at Afculum, were flaine. This bloudie deed being reported at Rome, did greatly plunge the minds of the Romanes in doubt and forrow. For this flaughter was as it were an Adamant to draw the other Italians, who did not conspire in this murther to their part, and as a firy beacon to the Romanes, to give them warning not to prescribe too much in their pro-

speritie, but to be circumspect, & by all warie

preuention to anticipate these euils, which if

it should have bene neglected of them, would

presently have turned to such a cloud of in-

conveniences, that the fire which did before

CLOTHO, OR

tioners of Italie had this purpose and intent, force to burne and confume: for the next neighbour to admonition is correction, and it is easier to avoide then to escape a danger. But the Romanes with prouident care forefeeing that the defection and revolt of them who were linked in societie with them, might be a great maime to their Estate, & as it were a ladder for forreine and professed enemies to scale the walles of their Citie, did therefore in this war make speciall choise, both of Captaines and fouldiers: for meane men were not to be employed in a warre of so great importance, and they that were vnskilfull, were not in the midst of these eminent dangers, to be trained and taught. And because they saw that the commodious ending and composing of this war, was the hinge whereupon the whole estate of the Common-weale did depende; therefore it was decreed by Senate, that both the Confuls (a rare thing in that Commonweale, and neuer done but when exceeding daunger was feared ) should go in person to the managing of this warre. Neither were the Italias vnprouided or vnaduised: for they knew, that if they were coquered, they should

serue to giue light, would after haue bent his force

fall from the estate of fellowes to be slaues, & their league should neuer more be trusted, which them selues had broken; and if they should enjoy the victorie, that they should then have all the wealth of the world at commaund. This golden bootie being enameld with a sweete desire of reuenging old iniuries (for they had written them in marble with a pen of yron) did greatly incense their minds, and rauith their spirits with a burning affectio to fight. The Marsians who brought the first Rubble to kindle this flame, were gouerned by Silo Popedius, a man as it feemed by derall enemy to stiny opposed against the Romanes, to whose the Romans. cares nothing was so delightfull as the report of a Romanes death, hating that hower in which he did not impeach their good estate. He in this respect was diverse from manie of his countrimen, in that he detested a Romane because he was a Romane. VVherefore ha-

uing singled out some of his factio, who were partly by the instinct of their nature, partly

by his instigation, obdurate and eager in hat

tred against the Romanes, having proposed

and shewed vnto them the scope and drifte

where-

whereunto his purpose did aime, and having disclosed the meanes, whereby he hoped to compasse and effect his designements, and laftly having declared vnto them the rewards which they might gaine by their valor, he did labour by this speech to inflame their surie, I am moued and enforced to this new enter- 9 Silo Popeprise, not by anie ambitious desire of enhaun- », dius his ocing my estate, but because I see a poison- , the Marsiful baite of deceit hidden vnder the pretence » of Societie, because I see too great charges & » burdens to be imposed vpon vs, because I see, leud forreiners to be our commaunders, and ; originarie Italians, though men of good de-,, fert, kept vnder the snaffle, and placed in the » finke hole. I fee the credite of our nation de- » faced, the libertie destroyed, and the state o- >> uerthrowne, and for our great labours vnder- » taken, and dangers sustained for the Romans, , we have this reward, that we are despised by ,, them, and they have not thought it sufficient, to be aided by vs, vnlesse in the pride of their » spirits they may insult vpon our neckes, men , of insolent mindes, by nature iniurious to all, other men and by fortune superiour. If a man , & Remus bastards.

, (·

» should examine from the beginning, and as » they fay from the roote; the degrees of their » estate, what instige shall he find ? nay what in-» iusticeshal he not find ? The two twinnes who » were the founders of their city, were bastards, » begotten by the rape of a holy virgin, and by » destinie were cast foorth as of no regard, vn-» till a she wolfe feeling perhaps some sauour Nourished by a wolfe. " of her owne nature in them, did with her dugs » nourish them. After, when from milke they » were growne to meate, they were fedde by a » chough, and when they had attained to mans » estate, nothing would please then but a king-» dome, & a regall citie, the foundation wherof » was folemnized by an augurie deriued from "the flight of Eagles. Thus a most rauenous » bird did ominate vnto them a monarchy, thus » a most greedie beast whose hungry teeth, and » ynfatiable appetite no pray could content; » did give them milke, thus a most the cuish and » busie brained birde was their foster-father. » These were the portents and signes of their

» Citie, that it should be a daughter verie like

» to the parents: these did prognosticate vnto

» vsthe spoiles, rapines, inuasions and violent

incroch

incrochments that should afterward be made, by the Romanes. And for that cause Romulus, wold not make or appoint limits and bounds » for his kingdome, that he might by force en- » ter into euery soile as his own. But what wold » not Romulus do, which had the hearts of hed so Remusis the bloud of his owne and onely brother? "Romulus, And thus was their citie cofecrated by bloud: » but some of the Romanes do with impuden " cie denie this fact, some with modestie do » doubt of it, some with griefe do concealeit, » and they which by cleare proofe are enforced ,, to confesse it, do with this imagination molli-, fie the fault, that it was done by the consent, but not by the hand of Romulus, But whether » he commaunded it, or committed it, he was » a murtherer. After this hainous crime enfued » the rape of the Sabine virgins, the rauilhment 35 The rape of whom they excuse, because they would not "of the Sayeeld their franke consent to mariage: surely "sins. they cannot justly be reproued, if they, being ; a noble people, did denie mariage to such a » base assemblie of shepheards, heardsmen and , hoggards, newly crept out of the straw : for in , that great assemblie of newe vostartes there is CLOTHO, OR » were but an hundred men, who were lawfully begotten, and these forsooth were at the first » made Senators. But nothing doth more be-» wray the vniust dealing and lacke of consci-» ence in the Romanes, then the lamentable e-» state of the Saguntines, who had bin alwayes » verie constant in fellowship and friendship so toward them, and whilest they did keep their » faith to them, they lost their Citie. Saguntus » was fiercely belieged by Hanniball, which » when the Romanes heard, they fent presently mane em- » Embassadours to Hannibal to dehort him fro. aredespi- withe siege, but being despised they went to sedostia went to sedostia went to sedostia. » gainst Hannibal pretending that he had bro-» ken the league, but failing of their purpose, » they returned to Rome. Amids these delaies, » that poore citie within eight or nine moneths. safter the laying of siege was destroied of the » Carthaginians, when the inhabitats were berable fa- » foreconfumed with famine, and one of them Sagutines. » did cate anothers carkaffe, and being wearie

» of the world, because they should not come

» as captives into the enemies power, they

» made a common fire, into which when one of them

them had flaine another with the sword, they so were throwne. How manifest and manifold is so the abuse which they offred to the Carthagi- » nians? They did incite Masinissa the neigh->> bour of the Carthaginians to quarrell with "Massinista them, who præcended that the Carthaginias "quarelleth ought to have no more land then Dido the mann, Carthagi-Tyrian queene did enioy, which was as much ». as could be measured by the hide of an Oxe 35 being cut into thongs. But could their prescri->> ption & possession during the space of seauen, hundred yeares be so easily dissipated? by the » same reason the Romanes should content the » felues with the cottages and cabbins, which » first they inhabited. But the Carthaginians » being greatly vexed by Masinissa and the Ro-> manes assisting him, did fall prostrate at the » feere of the Romanes, and did grieuously co-> plaine of the intollerable couetousnesse and » pride of Masinissa, and requested with teares, » that of three things they might obtaine one: » namely, that either they might equally debate the whole cause and controuersie before » the regents of some common-weale leagued » in societie with them both, and indifferently »

» affected toward them, or that they would » suffer them to defend theselves by just warre » against the vniust armes of Masinissa, or lastly, » if fauour did more preuaile with them then » truth, that they would once determine and » certainly fet downe, what and how much they » should yeeld to Masinissa. But the Romanes » did not one whithelpe these afflicted persons, Sciplosent m and that good Affricanus, whom they so " much commended, being sentas an indif-Mafiniffa wherent empire betwixt them and their energy thaginias. mie, did make their discord a great deale » more: and the desolate Carthaginians, when » they were enforced to prouide for the selues, » were accused at Rome for the breach of » league, and hereupon they were declared to » be enemies. They had straite commandemer » from the Romans to restore the Romane ho-» stages, to deliuer their money and treasure » into the hands of the Romanes, and by that » meane to purchase the safetic of their Citie: » all this was done. VVell this was not enough: s the Romanes must have their ships, their mus nition and weapons: they delivered these » likewise : yet this suffised not : the Romanes must must have their Citie, and the Carthaginians, must build some other Citie farre from this: ,, this was graunted vnto them, and Carthage, the fairest Citie of all Affricke was by them, The Citie presently burnt, and turned even with the 20 ge burne. ground. Here when the Romanes were pref-, fed and vrged with their promise, their answer, was, that in speaking of the safetie of the Ci-, tie, they did meane the safetie of the citizens , and inhabitants, not of the Citie which did, consist of stone and timber: O snares! ô im- 1, postures! ô sophistrie! can the Romans without blushing object perfidiousnesse and tre-, cherie to the Carthaginians? Surely as they, dealt with them being leagued in ancient fo-,, cietie with them, so I am afraid they wil deale with vs. And I do the rather suspectit, because, I see they will stil have a difference betweene, them selues and vs. Herein lieth a mysterie, ,, I will not fay of the Punicke fraude, but of the, Romane arre. And when it pleaseth them to ,, drawe the curtaine, we shall be made their, flaues, and our goods their dearling. V Vher-,, forel request you all with all the vehemencie, and force of my minde, that you would with 3,

" one heart contend for the recouerie & de"fence of liberty, and that you would at length
" aime at such a common-weale, wherein right
" and law, not the private will of powerful men
" may be are sway. To the which purpose I know
" all the other people of Italie ioyned in league
" and sellowship with vs, will affoord the dili" gent assistance of their persons." and the bost

" gent affiltance of their persons, and the best wealth of their treasuries. As for me, such hath " my birth, such hath my education bene, that I preferre the dignitic of my country, and the

" libertie of this common-weale before all " things in the world. VV hich if you do so desi-" roully embrace, I am fully resoluted to lay my " life open to all dangers, without anie regard

" of estate or private respect: if not, I will lay
"downe weapons, and leave the estate of the "common-wealth as it now standeth, to your

" owne discretion.

The Marsianshearing the name of liberty, did greedily receive it, and therefore applauding to Popedius, as informing them of that which was most for their vse, because there appeared in his speech no signes of couetousnesses ambition, but an earnest and vehicle or ambition, but an earnest and vehicle or ambition, but an earnest and vehicle or ambition.

hement desire of publique good, did resolue to follow him as their generall.

They had no fooner fet up flagge of defiance against the Romanes, but there resorted vnto them a huge multitude of all the prouinces of Italie: so readie are disloyall persons to cast off the yoke of obedience, or common focietie, when they have gotten a head. The metamorphosis truly was verie great, to see the Citie of Rome enuironed on all sides by foes, which before was garded by friends, & there was none almost lest to desend the City but the citizens, and nothing to defend the citizens but the Citie. The people that reuolted were the Marsians, the Samnites, the Vmbrians, the Vestini, the Irpini, the Lucani, the Marrufini, the Afculani, the Peligni, the Pifani:and they were led by great Captaines, men of valour and service, having as great desire to fight with the Romanes, as the Romanes had to rule ouer them. The most of them were of so choise courage and conduction, that the Romanes had before in many warres relyed vpontheir seruice. But yet the name of a Romane was such a scepter to their spirits, that they were still kept in awe and order without anie thought of revolting. These men were now quite altered, as if they had lately bene at some mart of soules, and had exchaunged their mindes with some men by nature enraged against the Romanes: and it is greatly to be wondred how the mightie power of the divine Maiestie, doth sway the moments of things, and forteth them in peremptorie maner to straunge and vnlooked for effects, making reason blind, pollicie astonished, stregth feeble, and valour dastardly, turning loue into hatred, feare into furie, boldnesse into trembling, and in the circuite of one minute making the conquered person a conqueror. The Romanes did not in anie warre shewe more wisedome and courage, which two things are in common vaderstanding repugnant, because wisedome for the most part procureth feare in dangerous accidents, which is oppofite to courage, and courage caufeth rashnesse which is contrarie to wisedome. But so were their fortunes croffed, & the lot of warre was so variable, that this warre was resolutely vndertaken of them, vnhappily continued, and victo-victoriously concluded. The Romane armie had two Generals: namely P. Rutilius one of the Confuls, whose Lieutenants were Cn.Popeius Strabo, Q. Cæpio, C. Perperna, C. Marius, Valerius Mcsalla: and L. Cæsar the other Conful, who had these Lieutenants, P. Lentulus, T. Didius, P. Licinius Crassus, L. Cornelius Sylla, M. Marcellus, all famous Captains, men of excellent defert and heroicall qualities, and the most of them fit not onely to manage a warre, but a kingdom, yea an Empire: yet of all these none did obtaine the victorie during the first yeare of their fight, C. Marius and L. Cæsar onely excepted, yet Cæsar was not long before with his whole armie discomfited, and Marius did with great difficultie atchicue one victorie, which was the beginning of a greater warre. The Confuls did thus difpose the encounters of them selues and their Lieutenants, L. Cæsar was opposed to Vettius Cato, who led a wing of the Marsian armie, but Cæsar being ouer mated by a man of greater wisedome and magnanimitie, was enforced to flie, and after the flaughter of two thouland of his men, being hotely pursued &

CLOTHO. OR enchased of the enemie, was constrained (for tenancie.

Q Cæpio

flight.

necessitie will affoord no choise) to take Afernia for his refuge: C. Perperna did encoun-C.Perperna discharged of his Lienter P. Præsenteius, who put him likewise to flight, & deuested him of his armie, for which cause he was discharged of his Lieutenancie, and now was C. Marius fought vnto by the Consuls, to whom he yeelded such assistance, that he rather seemed to be their protectour then their champion. P. Rutilius to revenge the death of Q Capio, who was flaine by the ambush of Popedius, and the quarrell of his fellow Conful, vpon the Marsians, did assay P.Rutilius them by battell, but lost a great number of men,& in the end lost himselfe, being slaughtered in the midst of his enemies. C. Marius C. Marius with a fresh courage renewed the fight, & put putteth Vettue Cato to flight with extreme labor Vettius Cato the > messenger who brought the newes of this victorie of Marius to the Romane campe, did meete there another mellenger, who reported vnto them, that Equalius one of the enemies campe had surprised Venafrum a towne of greatstrongth:that M.Lamponius another fatall enemie to both the Consuls. But the

of their enemies had flaine eight hundred of the armie of P. Licinnius Crassus, and had put the residue to flight, that C. Papius Mutilus their enemie, had brought Nola a flourishing Colonie of the Romanes into his power, together with Q.Posthumius their Prætor, that he had also taken Stauia, Minturna and Salernum, and did nowe beliege Acerra a chiefe towne. These newes succeeding the other did make the Romanes to heare with joy, and to remember with forow. But no better fortune did enfue: for M. Marcellus being affigned for the defence of Æfernia was taken prisoner by the Samnites, who furprifed that Colonie. Cn. Pompeius was by three Captaines of the aduerse part, Iudacilius, Æfranius, and Ventidius fiercely encountring, driven to the vil-

THE FIRST BOOKE

had a prosperous victorio against the Samnites, but C. Marius fighting against the Mar- C. Marius sians with doubtfull event, did recompense ly against the the death of eueric enemie with the loffe of Maissans. his owne souldiers: so constant is the fortune

lage of Firmo, and there belieged. L. Cælar of warre in inconstancie. Now was come the secondly care of this dawn gerous watre, which Some

CLOTHO, OR continued old broiles, and made new Consuls Cn. Pompeius Strabo, L. Portius Cato, both which were by the decree of the Senate enioyned to take vpon them the charge of this warre. They brought some new Lieutenants in the place of some that were dead, and some that were discharged. The succeeding Lieutenants were A. Albinius, Cosconius, Luceius, A. Gabinius, Sulpitius, L. Muræna, Cæcilius Pius, Mamercus Æmilius. It seemeth that Rome in these dayes was a verie schoole of warfare, which did yeeld the supply of such excellent Captaines, after the departure of C Marius dif Captaines not much more excellent. C. Ma! liked by the Conful Por- rius vpon adilliking conceiued by the Consul Portius (private humor is alwayes an enemie to publike good) was discharged of his place! Bur lo it happened, that the Romanes changed their fortune with their Confuls, but the Italians were more daunted and disanimated by the continuance of the warre, then encouraged by the increase of their victories. For a base spirit cannot loy in any honorable

matter, & nothing more denoureth the heart

of a rebellious or trecherous person, then the inward

inward fire of a glowing conscience. L. Sylla Syllaes vi-had a notable victoric against the Samnites, the Sanites. and did ransacke their tents! Cn. Pompeius C Æsculani, and the Pisani to yeeld vnto him. victories. Sylla did kil Cluentius a Captaine of the con- syllakilleth trarie part at Nola; and he brought under his Cluentius. power the Irpini. A. Gabinius did fight pro. A. Gabinius sperously against the Lucani, and tooke many perous fight of their great townes, but when he wold have spoiled their tents, he was slaine. Sulpitius han uing slaine all the souldiers of the Marrugini, sulritius did reduce that whole region into the subjet bringeth the ction of the Romanes. L. Murana and Caci-obedience. lius Pius had manie encounters against the Marsians, and in the ende enforced them to yeeld, but Popedius their Captaine the au- Popedius is thor of this warre was flaine in fight, in which flaine. war Portius Cato was also slaine, not through Portius Cato his owne default, nor by the valor of his ene-flaine. mies, but through the malicious stomacke of the forme of O. Marius; who in reuenge of his fathers quarell, did throw his dart at him, and with a deadly wound did make him fall prostrate to the ground: but because he could not be differred in fuch confusion of fight, & in the heate of the battell; he was not impeached forthistrecherous murder. The Romans having enjoyed and accomplished all things. according to their defire, returned with the great ioy and gratulation of their fellow citi-Cn. Popeius Strabo trizens. On Pompeius, for his ample victories umplieth. & great defert was rewarded with a triumph. Thus was the Italian warre being left to the Romanes as the legacie of Drusus ended and appealed, which wrought two notable effects: for it brought the Italians from focietie to feruitude; and refusing the bridle they received the yoke, and were euer after kept under the chaine of perpetuall commaund, but the Romanes it made glorious and inuincible: for their just warres had alwayes good successe, and their virult warres or inuations, could not (as may partly appeare by this Italia vprore) by forraine warre be reuenged. But for the cause hereof let no man make search or inquirie, fith it is no where to be foud faue only in God his decretall booke, the contents

whereofas I cannot know, fo the comments

of man in this matter I may not believe. This thing

thing therefore as vailed with vimost darkenesse, I do with all humblenesse leave to him who hath referred it to himselfe: & this onely lobserue, which everic man may note in the sequele of this historie, that the Romans were punished by the Romanes for their wrongs & iniuries (if I may vie coniecture in so thicke a mist) done to their neighbours and others. Not long after the death of Drusus the Confulfhip inuested vpon Q. Pompeius & L. Cornelius Sylla, who before his victory could not consul. be too highly commended, and after neuer sufficiently dispraised: so contrarie and oppofite he was to him felfe, being more mercifull in the combat, then after the conquest, and Sylla fighting in the field was not so cruell as Syllahis co-Sylla triumphing in the towne. He was nobly His diffeent descended, being the sixth man from Cornelius Rufinus, who was one of the chiefe Captaines in the warre against Pyrrhus. For the glorie and credite of that familie had bene long intermitted, and was almost perished, till it was raised and rampired up by Sylla to the ancient grace, and restored with an ouerplus to the former dignitie. Sylladid a long time behave him felfe for modestly and contentedly schacke seemed to be without all intent for thing for the Consulthip, but after his Pratorship being much renowned by the !ta-

THE FIRST BOOKE.

Mithridates,

lian warre; & for his great exploits in France; having staine the stoutest Captains of the aduerse part, he tooke stomacke by reason of his good successe, and making sure for the Consulthip, was made Consult, not one citil zen almost withdrawing his consent, and that honour he purchased when he was eight and sortic yeares olde. At that time Mithridates

dier, being sometime great in prosperitie, and at all times great in courage, in counfell wife, in firength mightie, in hatred against the Romanes another Hannibal, had taken and possess fest Asia, where he put to death all the Romanes that did there inhabite the region of Asia did by lot happe to Sylla as his province.

in enemy to king of Pontus, a sharpe and victorious soul-syllabefie at length to Nola; which he belieged, for that geth Nola. Citie did most stubburnly resist the Romans, revolting from that faithfulnesse which the Nolanes

he addressing him selfe thitherward with as

great speed as he could possibly make, came

Nolanes did religiously observe and exhibito to the Romanes in the Carthaginian warres: but not long after the laying of this siege, he was abridged of his Generalship by Sulpitius 511

was abridged of his Generalthip by Sulpitius Sulpitius a Tribune, who being in wealth, fauor, friend-feditious Tribune, wit, and courage great amongst the Ro-reththe state manes, having before sought dignitie by defert, did now by his leud decrees and disloyall practises deserve to loose his dignitie. He assigned to C. Marius an imperiall pracheminence, & the regimet of all the provinces that belonged to the citie of Rome, which honors as Marius did ambitions of the sulpitius.

belonged to the citie of Rome, which honors as Marius did ambitiously desire, so Sulpitius The ambition of Marius did iniuriously dispose: and therewith all he enacted that Sylla should be called from Asia, and Marius should be Generall in his place; manic other pernitious lawes he established, both intollerable and detestable: for conclusion, he ended in murther; procuring by his Murder combined by sold thirsty servants the death of one of the sulpitius. Pompeys, sonne to Q. Pompeius, and Syllaes sonne in lawe. Sylla hearing of this sodaine change, and being solicited by the letters of his dearest friends, made speedic returne to the Citie, which having taken by sorce of

I

armeshe drove out of it the twelve authours with P. Sulpitius the first beginner of discord, Sulpitius being taken by Syllaes horfemen in the Laurentine fennes was there beheaded & for the guerdon of his cruelty, his head being of this newe and damnable faction, among it

whom was C. Marius and his fonne, together afterward conveyed to Rome, was creded vpon a pinnacle ouer the barre of the Senate house. C. Marius (a cleare mirrour of this worlds viconstancie ) to whom if you will place him amongst the fortunate, you must affigue the highest seate, if amongst the vnfortunate, the lowest, having before enjoyed all pleasures which prosperitie could yeeld, and now suffering all troubles which aduersitie sixticth yeare of his age, for the anoyding of Syllaes horsemen, stripped himselfe naked,& C.Marini flying to a marrish of reedes did there hide himfelfe, plunging fo deepely into the mud,

could bring)after his fixth confulfhip, and the

that nothing could be seene of him but his eyes and nostrels, who being afterward defcried, was drawne by a thong of leather tied to his neck, into the prison of Minturna. There was sent to kilhim a captine slave, whom Ma- A ceptine rius had taken prisoner in the battel which he fau fent to fought against the Cimbrians: this bloudie Cimbrian assaying to strike Marius, was fodainly amazed, and terrified by the maiestie of his countenance, though Marius was then full of yeares, full of miserie, and void of weapons: but the flaue feeing fo bright a starre in so darke a dungeon, reuerencing the man whom he had before feared, and perswading himselfe that it was impossible for one man to workehis death, who not long before had almost destroyed the whole nation of the Cimbrians, left him aliue, and in trembling maner departed from his presence. The Minturnians. because they held the worthinesse of Marius in high reputation, deliuered him out of prifon, and attiring him with convenient appa- The Minturrell, bestowing vpon him a pilgrims viande, nas friends which might for a scason relieue his hunger, dismissed him out of their Citic. He having ouertaken his sonne at Æmaria, dirested his

THE FIRST BOOKE.

voyage vnto Affricke, where he led a poore

and wretched life in the ruines and desolate renants of the Citie of Carthage. Sylla leuied Q Pompe-an armie & renewed his journey toward Asia, (the years wherein Sylla was Consull, was the first years in which the Romane souldiers did slay their Consull; for then Q. Pompeius being sellow Consull with Sylla, was slaine by the seditious armie of Cn. Pompeius Proconsull.) After the broiles of Marius and Sulpitius the tumults of Cinna succeeded, who was not one iote more temperate then those discorderly and enormous quarellers, or rather furious and traiterous conspirers. He was Co-sull with Cn.Octauius, who because one of them namely Cinna, fauoured Marius, and the other Sylla, sell to a sodaine iarre, & maintaining seuerall armies in the Citic, caused much terror, and some bloudshed. Cinna was expulsed the Citic by the power of Octauius and the Senators, his Consulship was abroga-

Cinna beginneth a new broyle.

Cinna is ex pulfed the City,

Cinna is made Captaine of a feditious acted, and in his place L. Cornelius Merula, Iupiters priest was elected. Cinna having corrupted the Centurions, Tribunes & souldiers with hope of liberalitie, was admitted of that armie (which was as yerabout Nola) for their Captaine, and having sworne all his souldiers

to obcisance and loyaltie, he marched in his Consul-

Consul robes toward Rome, his armie consisting of three hudred bands of good souldiers amounting in the view of spials to the number of thirtie legions: but though he had manie fouldiers and much courage, he lacked notwithstanding factioners and fauourites to vphold him, and was destitute of popular credit, which might bolfter and support his doings. For supplying of which want, he called from banishment C. Marius and his sonne, with all Cinn's callette. Marius and his sonne, with all Cinn's callette. Marius and his sonne, with all Cinn's callette. the other Romanes which were before by tius and his fonne from Syllaes horsemen chased out of the Citie banishment. VVhilest Cinna was thus preparing warre against his mother towne, Cn. Pompeius father to that great state, of whom we shall hereafter speake, whose worthie actes in the Marsian warre, together with his victorie at Asculum, was verie beneficiall and commodious to the common-weale, being frustrate of hope to continue the Proconsulship, shewed him selfe con Pomverie indifferent and equall to the factions, to Pompey doing all things for his proper and private the greathing

good, and lying in waite for oportunitie to and vicens

ferue his owne turne and advancement, encli-flancy.

ning his armie this way and that way, now as a

fanourer to Cinna, & now as a friend to Sylla,

following fortune by conjectures, and deter-

A great figh betwixe Cinna and mining to joyne with him, who by all likelihood hould be most puissant; at length he encountred with Cinna before the citie walse Cn. Popelus where after a maine sea of bloudshed, the Romanesthat were you the walles, beholding the flaughter of their brethren, friends and kinsfolke under the wals, the battell was fully finished, but the victoric was doubtfull. Not long after Cn. Popeius died, by whose death the fouldiers of Cinna conceived fo greation andgladsomnesse, that they forgat the finall ouerthrow of their fellow fouldiers, and the

Romans did bestow their reuenge vpo Pom-

pey being dead, which they did owe to him

being aliue. Cinna and Marius did not with. out great hauocke of men and matrons inrestheheesty uade the citie: but Cinna entred first, and published a lawe touching the receiving of Ma-rius, then C. Marius entred the wals with a recalled fro most fatall and daungerous returne to the citie ot Rome. Nothing had bene more blou.

die then his entrance, if his death had not thortly enfued: for having possessed the citie,

he was more vusatiate in his crueltie then any rauchous tiger, and more mercilesse in his tragicall punishments, then any furie, breathing nothing but bloud, and delighting in nothing but murder neither did the licentious rage of his wrath content it selfe with the bloud of meanermen, but it seised upon the states and starres of the citie. Then did Octavius one of Octavius the Confuls, a man of a mild & douelike hu-put to death by the cruelmor, render up his life into the pawes of these tleof Marius wolues: and Merula, who a little before the returne of Cinna had through feare renouneed the Consulhip, cut in peeces his owne Merula cutveines, and sprinkling his lukewarme bloud ceshis owne vpon the altar, vpon which he had often facrificed the bloud of beafts, and intreating the gods for the execratio of Cinna, to whom he had often prayed for the prescruation of the citie, gaue up his fainting ghost in a great agonie of mind. M. Antonius the chiefe of the M Antonius citie, and the Phænix of eloquence, was flain put to death by Marius & at the commaundement of Marius and Cin-cinna, na, by the swords of their souldiers, whome

by the sweetnesse of his eloquence he did a long time restraine and delay from the killing

Q Catulus of him. Q Catulus a man famous for his vertues and valour in the Gimbrian warre, the glorie of which he did participate with Marius, as we have about reported, when he was hunted to death by these greedie bloudhounds, shut himself into a narrow closet that was newly pargited with lime, and having there a fire of burning coales, which might raile vp a sudden dampe, stopping his breath with a yaporous and dankish smoke, departed this world, rather according to his owne wish then his enemies will: then were the streetes, channels, theaters, market places, and temples strewed and overspread with carcasses, so that it could hardly be judged, whether these two tyrants did flay more that they might obtaine the victorie, or more were put to the fword that they might fafely enjoy the victorie. For cuerie one to whome Marius would not reach out his hand by way of salutation, was immediatly flaine. The common weale was now in a tottering and ruinous estate: couctousnesse was the cause of crueltie, and the more wealthie a man was, the more faultie he was judged: the accuser of a rich man had his pay and reward out of the coffers of him that was accused: and then was profite and honestie confounded and made one. Afterward Cinna and Marius were Consuls, Cinna was now the second time Conful, Marius the seuenth time, who in that confulfhip died, a Ro-dieth. mane in war terrible to his enemies, in peace to his friends, and at all times impatient of quietnesse: in his place was chosen Valerius Haccus. Cinna being now the fole regent of Italie, the greatest part of the Nobilitie fled to Sylla into Achaia, who in the meane time did so fight with Mithridates his Lieutenants and Coronels about Athens, Macedonia, and Beotia, that he tooke Athens, and made great hauocke of his enemies. But if any impute the rebellion of these times vnto the citie of Athens, he is altogether ignorant of the truth, ans faithfull For the faith of the Athenians was alwaies to the Rofirme and inuiolate towards the Romanes, that every action which was performed without blemish or staine of promise, was said to be done by an Athenian faith: but they being heavily oppressed by the vnsusserable vsage of Mithridates his host, were besieged of their

CLOTHO, OR friends, when they were held captine of their enemies; and obaying necessitie stayed their bodies within the wals, though their minds were without, and entirely with the Romans.

silla his hard where he found Mithridates very tractable &

of peace co- suppliant vnto him whome he punished with childed with Mitheidates, the paiment of a great summe of mony, and

Sylla did then conduct his armie into Asia,

with the losse of part of his nauie, enjoyning

him to depart out of Asia, and out of all the

prouinces which he had vniuftly inuaded, and

constraining him to content himselfe with the inheritance discended from his father, which was the kingdome of Pontus: he tooke from Mithridates the Romane prisoners without

mong Syllacs labours, then that whole three yeares.

ransome, and vsed great seueritie against the traiterous revolts, and runagates. Sylla hauing thus appealed and qualified forraine affaires, went by sea toward Rome, and in the The ting of way met him certaine ambassadours from the Parthia sens Parthian king, which were sent to gratulate Sylla. his victorie, he being the first of the Romanes to whome the king of Parthia fent ambassa dours. There was nothing more worthic a-yeares space, whilst the factioners of Cinna & Marius did besiege the townes of Italie, he neither pretended any fauour toward them, neither did he omit that which he had in had, namely the subduing and vanquishing of forraine enemies: for he knew when external tumults were ended, he might with more ease extinguish domesticall enemies. Before the comming of Sylla, Cinna in a mutinie of his owne fouldiers was flaine, a captaine more Cinna is worthic to be adjudged to death by the difcretion of the conquerour, then to loofe his; life through the furie of his fouldiers, of whom it may truly be faid, that he aduentured those things which no vertuous man wold attempt, & that he brought those things to passe, which none but a valiant fouldier could accomplish. Hisfellow Coful Carbo having no colleague did now prædominate and beare sway. Sylla sylla sylla fassett hauing entred Italie, it was thought lie came quietly thonotas a reuenger of warre, but as an authour, of poace, with such quietnesse and mildnesse he lead his armie through Calabria and Apulia, with a great & speciall regard of the grow. ing corne, of meddowes, of men, of castles,

THE FIRST BOOKE.

TO AND THE PROPERTY OF THE PRO and cities, and indeed he affayed by lawfull articles, and equall conditions, to appeale the discord, but peace could not please them which were immoderatly couctous. Sillacs army did daily increase, cuery good and difcrete Italian making recourse vnto him, and he had a most happy victory about Capua an gainst Scipio and Norbanus Consuls, Norbanus being ouercome by fight, Scipio, being forfaken of his army, yet Sylla gaue him leave to depart, without hurt or hinderance, to vnlike was he to himselfe in his warres, and after his victory, for whill the victoric was fresh, he was more mild then equitie required, but when peace had taken roote; he was more cruell then any barbarous Scythian, for Q. Sertorious the fury and firebrand feth Sertoof that rebellious warre, which not long after enfued; being difarmed by Sylla, was fent away in fafety, and many others he did with the lame clemency intreate: of purpole, as I thinke, that he might give an example of a double and diverse mind in openially and by that meane shroud and couer the contents

ofpublike mishap, in the city of Rome, where before men did emulate one another in vertuous actions, now they did combate and contend in malicious practifes, & he thought himselfe the best man, that was most wicked and iniurious. Sylla had three mighty aduerfaries, Carbo, and C. Marius, the fonne of Marius that was the seauenth time Consull, which both were Confuls whilst Sylla rong an allarme at the gates of Preneste, and Pontius Telefinus, who leuying an army of the Samnites, did stoutly confront Sylla before the walles of Preneste, he was an Italian borne, but was not free of the city of Rome, a valiant fouldier and a great enemy to a Romane name, who stood in defence of Preneste, but not with the Consuls. This Telesinus condu-Silla fighteth cting forty thousand fighting men joyned misasumbattell with Sylla at Collina, and brought both him and the commo-weale to extreame danger: for Rome was not in greater feare, when the tents of Hanniball were but three miles distant from her walles. Telesinus did greatly encourage his fouldiers, saying that the day of their battell was the last period of »

THE FIRST BOOKE.

of his heart. At that time to fill vp the measure

a the Romano glorie, and he cried that Rome, «Rome mult be throwne downe, and razed from a the foundations, adding therewithall that "there wold never be wanting inuadors of the a Italian liberties, as long as the wood stoods " where fuch wolves were harboured. At the first houre of the night the Romane armie reulued their courage, Telefinus the next day after was found halfe dead, bearing the count tenance rather of a conqueror then of a man subdued, whose head being cut off Sylla con maunded to be earled along the streetes of Preneste. C. Marius, his life being in a despethe younger rate case, was faine to creepe through certaine is flaine by Syllaes foul holes of the earth to escape his enemies, but diers. he was flaine of Syllaes fouldiers that were appointed for that purpose, of which towardly gentleman, what opinion Sylla caried, a man may easily conjecture: for when he was flaine he intitled himselfe Sylla the fortunate, which had indeed bene true if he had ended Sylla viur-peth the Di his life with his victories. For having entred Catothip. the citie and vsurped the Dictatorship, which had bene an hundred and twentie yeares in termitted, (for the last Dictator before Sylla was was made the first yeare after Hannibals departure out of Italic, so that it was apparant, that the Romanes did not so much desire the vse of a Dictator, as they did feare his tyrannie) he began presently to broach the bloud of citizens, having, alreadic drawne to the bottome the bloud of straungers: foure legions of fouldiers, who had bene of the contrarie faction, and had now vpon couenant of life submitted themselves to his mercie, calling in vaine voon the faith of a Romaine foldier, he caused to be slaine: fine thousand of that armie which fought against him at Preneste, being promised life by P. Cethegus his the souldiers Lieutenant, he put to a sudden and vnlooked of Prenesse for death, and caused their iounts to be plucked in peeces, and commaunded that they should be dispersed and cast abrode in the wastes and mores. After these great and extreme cruelties, he put in practife the heavie penaltie of proscription, which if it had died with Sylla, would have beene a great part of put in prathe Romane happinesse: by that meanes he brought to passe, that whosenames soeuer he writin the table of proscription, should be vpontheir attachemet presently put to death their goods also were subject to sale, every one taking the benefit to whome Sylla would graunt it: neither was he content to rage a gainst them onely which had before opposed themselues to him, but the most quiet and in nocent citizens for the greatnesse of their wealth he depriued also of life, and against silly women did he bend his wrath, as not fatisfied with the death of ment and, which was a signe of a Thracian crueltie, as soone as the heads of the flaine citizens were parted from their trembling corles, breathing as yet, their faces being not wholly deprived of a vitall solution bloud, he did gaze vpon them, and toffe the in his hands that he might feed on them with his eyes, though he could not crush them with his teeth. VVith what fauagenesse did he be-M. Marius flain by Silla. haue himselfe in the killing of M. Marius whose eyes were pluckt out before his death, synante distributed and at that instant he enforced his synante synante distributed and at that instant he enforced his rage against sword through the bowels of M. Pletorius, be distributed with the tor ture of M. Marius. O extreme punisher of pires.

THE FIRST BOOKE.

tie and compassion, to whome it seemed a crime not to consent to crueltie. Neither did he spare the dead, for the ashes of C. Marius, The ashes of the older he caused to be raked out of the thrown into graue and throwne into a river. Sylla whilest a river by he fought the victorie, was to the Romanes a Scipio, whilst he ysed it a very Mithridates. Many other bloudsheds he did commit, and more would be have committed, had not the terrour of a guiltie conscience followed him, with the blazing brand of his vexed fouls, which torment some cal an ecstasie, some melancholie, some madnesse, but I denying it to be any one of these, allow it to be all these, doubtlesse it is a thing sooner felt the known, not to be avoided by medicine but by true felicitie. In this perplexitie he died, and yet, sylla dyeth. ceassed not the civil or rather vnciuil and vnbrotherly discordithus was Rome the famous citic of Europe, the mother and nurce of worthie Senators, the miracle of nations, the epitomie of the world, the kingdome of Mars, and the scauenheaded sourraigne of many prouinces exceedingly shaken with these quarrels, stained with these bloudsheds, and

بيل

specially fauoured, was veterly defeated and dissipated by L. Sylla, he sled presently into Spaine, where before he had bene Pretor, &

peius and Q Catulus hauing gathered an ar 2 Cn. Pont mie did proffer battell to Lepidus, and in a Coulus fight light skirmilh overcame him. Not long bet with Lepifore the death of Sylla, Q. Sertorius rifing in ucreame armes maintained warre in Spaine: for when him. he faw that the faction of Marius which he

there having gathered a greathoft and contriued an huge naule, fearing left Sylla, who Sertorius lehad put Carbo to flight and flaine Marius, in Spaine.

should fend an armie against him, he caused Liuius Salinator his Licutenant to encampe Liuius Salinator the

in the mountaines of Pyraneum, but he was Lieutenant of Sertorius afterward flaine by C. Anius the Romane flaine. Proconful, who was fent thither to abare the courage of Sertorius, and after him Q: Metellus was also sent; but their proceedings were not prospetous. V Vherefore Cn. Pom-peius being as yet a prinate man, had charge gillen him of the Senate rolls into Spaine.

There came at that time for the hide and affiltance of Sertorius, M.Perperna with a great multitude offouldiers. On. Pompeius made grieuoullydiscomforted with the death of her children, her babes were brought foorth for the fword to glue vpon, the bodies of her ancients were made as pauements to walk vpo, her matrons became a pray and prize to euery rauisher, her priests and deuoute sacrificers were flaine before the gates of the temples. Syllacs bodie was conneied in fumptuous manner to Campus Martius, in which place before the buriall the two Confuls, namely of Sylla.

M. Emilius Lepidus, and Q: Luctatius Catulus did carnestly debate about the repeadus and Ca- ling and cancelling of the acts and decrees of full touching Sylla. Lepidus vrged that they who were proscribed by Sylla, ought incontinent to be reduced to the cities and there to have restitution of their goods. Catulus together with the Schare defended the contrarie, faying that though his motion were good and honest, yes it might be the beginning of some tumult, which would be most daungerous if it were fuddenly done, because the common-weale was but newly recomforted, and had as yet enioyed but a short pause of tranquilitie. By this dissention they fell to weapons, Cn. Popeius way for himselfe through the Alpes, betwixt the famous springs of Padus and Rhodanus. He immediatly after his coming into Spain did enter into conflict with two of Sertorius his captaines, Herennius and Perperna, and not farre from the citie of Talentia ouercame thems Herennius was there flaine, Perperna escaped by flight. Pompey did passe the winter in the Pyrenæan mountaines, Sertorius in Lustania, and at the beginning of the spring, Metellus and Pompeius did encounter with seuerall armies Sertorius and Perperna, in which battell Sertorius constrained Pompey to fly , and Metellus draue Perperna to the like extremitie, Popey was at that time, woung ded in the thigh, afterward they met againe at Seguntia, where Sertorius did the second time overthrow Pompey, and Metellus Perpermathethird time when Settgrius was coming against Metellus, Pompey meeting him in the way, caused him to retire; Sertorius did again coppose himself and Pompey Having taking Segida a noble citip of Celtiberia where Sertorius lost a thousand souldiers & Bompey as many: thoushey turned the felues

to the besieging of townes, Pompey did besiege Palantia, but Sertorius did raise the siege, and of them which besieged Caliguriu he did flay three thousand. Metellus and Ropeius with great stoutnesse & stomacke took many cities that were leagued with Sertorius and at llerda and lliosca the townes of the llergitanes they put Sertorius to a desperate plunge, but Galigurium the citie of the Vulcons he did with much proweffe & puissance defend. Sertorius was like to lugurth in his fight, and in his fortune not vnlike to him, the exploits and stratagemes of them both wore singular and admirable, but their end and last eucht was miserable and mournefull aluguritha was taken by treacherie: Sertorius by the Sertorius is treason of M. Antonius and M. Perperna his captaines was flaine, as he was fitting at a baquet, in the eight yeare of his rebellion, his empire was presently transferred to M. Porperna, whome Pompey ouercame, tooke prisoner, and pur to death, and in the tenth yeare after the beginning of this warre, he tooke Spaine. The Romanes were in these times busied & molested in Italie by certaine fencers or (word players, trayned up in a that dowed fight vnderthe gouernment of Lentul lus, but defying their maister, and stirred with an hellish humor to scate themselves in the highest thrones of honor (for as fire is to gun+ powder, fo is ambition to the heart of man, which if it be but touched with selfe-loue mounteth aloft and neuer bedeth downward till it be turned to ashes) they raunged them; selues, and drew to their enlighes a great mula titude offorlorn men. For in processe of time their armie did encrease to sourcecore thoufand and moe. The leaders were Spartacus, Enomans, and Guixus, who making great spoile and saccage in Italie, at length imbattelled themselves upon the mountaine Vefurius. Against them were sent Clodius Glaber sand Publius Varinius; but their armies were suddenly by these enemies discomsitted: therefore the yeare next enfuing C. Lentulus and L. Golhus Confuls, and Q. Arrius the Prætor prepared again hehem. Crixus one of these rebellious captaines, was together with his whole armic veterly ouerthrowne abut Spartacus, in whome was more vigor of sinewes, newes, courage, and counfell, conducting his fouldiers from the Apennine mountaine, to the Alpes, and from the Alpes into France, was at the first enforced to retire by one of the Confuls, by the other to flye, But afterward having animated, furneyed, and marshalled his men, he did suddenly turne backe vpon the Consuls, gaue them battell, in seue-sence-plaier, rall places ouercame them: & was marching doth encoun toward Rome there to possession felf of the of the Con-Capitole, and to erect a monarchie, but that, the Consuls reuniting their dissipated forces, did hardly with much labour & great flaughter of men restraine and hinder him. But he having lost his purpose, yet not loosing his Spartacus time surprised the goodly citie of the Thuri-taketh the rians, where breathing for a while & refresh, Thurians ing his armie, and soone after reencountring. the Romanes, he obtained a glorious victorie, and a plentifull spoile. This successe did notably enhance the pride of Spartacus, who prefuming now that he was better then the Consuls, thought himselfe therefore fit to be a king. And as Athenio not long before, a shepheard and drudge in the fields, having flaine his maister in Sicilie, and mustred vnder enligne a great number of vagrant perfons, by whose meanes he did spoile, and lay wast many hamlets, castles, and villages, and applauding to himselfe in this successful pillage and roguerie, was adorned with a purple garment, strowted and walked along with a staffe of silver, and environed his head with 2 crowne of gold: so did this rebell of Italie af-Sume to himselfe a regall pompe and title, & making fortune his rest, which of all things is most valike to it selfe, thought he might as: casily continue as beginne a conquest. But the Romanes who never could suffer victorie to warnie herselfe long with the robes of a straunger, committed the whole scope and charge of the warre to M. Crassus, their Præagainfispat tor, a man ambitious and venturous: he had uing ioyned battell with Granicus one of the rebell chieftaines, did slay both the captaine and thirtie flue thousand of his souldiers, and after fighting with Spartacus did flay him, & with him fortie thousand, five thousand onely escaped, whom Cn. Pompeius returning from the Spanish warre, did suddenly meete and

and presently put to the sword. After these times M. Cicero being Consul, whose nouity and strangenessein Rome, the nobilitie and rarenesse of his good gifts might infly excuse who for all his excellent qualities was more beholding to nature then education, as for his vertue famous, so for his eloquence most famous, by whom it was that the Romanes were not inferiour to them in wit, whom they vanquished in warre, the conspiracie of Catiline was detected and determined, and Cicero for his constancie, courage, & watchfulnesse, in suppressing the scalesire of that warre to the ytmost cinder, was intitled by the name of Pater patriæ, the father of his Cicero cal countrey. But before I enter into the dif parrie. course of his rebellion, I must make knowne the person of the traytor, and the cause of the treason. L. Sergius Catilina was in face and Catiline his feature comely and absolute, in wit prompt qualities. and pregnant, in eloquence sweet and delightfull, in pompe and maiestie princely and regall, in courtly behauiour quaint and delicate: and to set vpon this gold a Diamond, of a most noble parentage. There were certaine families amongst the Romanes, which sura mounted & overheaded the rest, being most auncient and of a worthie originall, and they are parted into two discents, some of them having the Aborigines to their auncestours, and somethe Trojanes. The first and principall of the race of the Aborigines, was the familie of the Vitellij, being discended fro Faunus the king of the Aborigines, which did inhabite Italie before the comming of Encas, and Queene Vitellia, which in many places was worshipped as a goddesse: the recod was the familie of the Fabij, whose ofspring is rightly deriued from Fabius the fon of Hercules the third was the lineage of the Antonij, issuing from Anton an other of Hercules his sonnes: the fourth was the race of the Potitij, so named of Potitius, who did with great curtesie entertaine Hercules, when he was entred Italie: the fift was the house of the Mal milij,borne of Mamilia the daughter of Telegonus one of Vlysses his sonnes begotten of Circe that notorious enchauntresse: The o. ther families which referred their beginning to the Troiane roote, were ten in number: first first the house of the Julij, who descended fro Julys the sonne of Aneas: the second the Amilija who tooke their name of Æmilius the sonne of Ascanius a Trojane, & of that house was the matchlesse Scipio, some to Paulus Amilius, who being the Romano Generall destroyed Carthage. The third the Nautij of Nautes one of Æneas his companions: for when Diomedes having stolen the image of Pallas, did perceive that it was of no vie to him, after the destruction of Troy he offered it as a present to Aneas passing by his kingdome, but as Aineas doing then facrifice was turning himselfe; Nautes did lay hold of the image, & by that meanes did appropriate the vse of it to himselfe, so that the Nautij and not the Iulij did enjoy the mysteries of Minerua: the fourth the Cloxlij of Cloxlitts an other of Æneas his companions: the fift the lunij of lunius an other of his affociates: the fixt the Ser The linge of Cariline. gij of Sergestus one of the Trojane captaines, of which familie was L. Sergius Catilina, and before him none of that name was ever tainted with any fauour of rebellion. Theifeuenth the Memij of Mucheus, an other of the Tro-conflires.

Μį

CLOTHO, OR iane trauellers, the eight the Cloantij of Cloanthus a bird of the same sether, the ninth the Giganij or the Gianij of the Troiane Gias, the tenth the Cacilij of Saculus a Trojane also who built Preneste. Catiline being ador. ned with the nobilitie aboue described, made himselfe through his vices and misdemeanor ignoble and odious: his life was the picture of licentiousnesses to women he was so lewdly affectionate, that every curtizane of Rome layed claime vnto him. And to marie Aurelia Orestilla into a vacant house, he committed the shamefull murder of his owne and onely child: for two thingshe promised her, and performed for her, which were tokens of mercilesse heart, the balefull death of his fon, and the chaunge of the state, in such fort that Aurelia Orestilla should be the Dictatresse of Rome. And for the performance he bound himselse by a cursed circumstance, drinking mans bloud to fill his bloudthirstie humour, In al his actions he was a perfect Protean, framing and compoling himselfe to all sides and fects: with the grauer fort of men he would be fad and scueres with the riotous, prodigall & excessive:

Catiline kil leth his own fonne,

excessive: with chast matrons modest and buxome: with light hulwives wanton and vaine: with young gentlemen pleasant and active: with auncient fathers demure and deliberatiue: to the baser sort curteous and pitifull: to the nobler persons sociable and gratefull: so variable & discoulored he was in his doings, that M. Cicero did greatly maruell at his manisold dexteritie. The first sparks of Catilines conspiracie began to blaze and appeare, L. Tullus, M. Lepidus being Consuls, sixehundred eightie & seuen yeres after the building of Rome. Atthat time was Catuline greatly greatly inindebted, & because he could not discharge debted. the summe within the time appointed and limited by lawe, nor bring in an estimate or waluation of his goods, whereby it might appeare that he was able to defray the debt, he was forbidden to make fute for the Conful-Catiline forship, whereupon being stirred by a reuenge-make sure for the Confull wrath, he sought by all meanes possible to sulfap. execute his iniurious intent. There was at that time in Rome Cn. Piso, a man of desperate boldnesse, poore and yet presumptuous, Catiline did open and impart his meaning to him and Pub. Antronius, and they three determ mined to kill the Confuls; which were made the next yeare after Catilines repulse. The inquisicion of this matter was deferred till it came to greater ripenesse. Afterward they inrended the death of the most part of the Senators: the time was appointed when their complices and confederates, abbetters, and affiltants flou dinect in armour: but because Catiline perceived that the number of these rebellious fouldiers was not yet sufficient to giue onservothe citie, he withdrew his hand for a rime, and dimissed the armie. But's yeare after M. Cicero, and C. Antoniushauing ontred the Confulfitip Catiline being nowalfo diffraced with another repulle, recollected into his seditious braine his auncil ent plots and former villanies: then he conspired with P. Lentulus & C. Cethegus Prætorstoworke the death of the Confuls, to flay the Senate, to burne the cities and to alter the state: and fonthis purpose they did by letters inuite to this horrible massacre many Romanes that were employed in forraine feruice. This being apparantly euident, & dangers being now at the doore; and in a readinesse ropierce into the citie, valesse some mature aduife were prefently taken, a Senate was appointed in the tomple of lupiter Stator, vnto which place shamelesse. Catiline, imagining that he might bleare their eyes by a pretendedipurgation reforted also, and with an vinchaunged countenance shrowded vinder the habite of a Senator, the heart of a serpent. And because the method of this historie may seeme in Misplace to require some description of the Senatorie state, I will briefly set downe the constant and perpetuall order of the Romanesingoing to their senate house, thougholf cannot counternaile with æquall termes, nor with a perfect discourse the great maiestic and pompe, that in this reuerend solemmitie was observed. The first place in the proceeding to their Senate had the Dictator, The folem-(when that office was in effe.) the next the nitie which the Romans Confuls, the third the Prærors: the Dictator vied in their was therefore preferred because his power to the Senate was supreme, and was not subject to the controll of any other, the Confuls were in the fecond place, because they were in præhemi-

1,100

gers

nence next to the Dictator, and all the decrees of the Senate were ratified by the, bearing date according to the dignitic of their persons: their triumphs also were signed with the same marke: such a triumph was said to bedone, such an one being the second time Confull, and fuch an one being the third time Coful, according as their advancement was In the third rancke of these greater Magistrates were the Prætors, because they had authoritie to call a Senate as the Dictator & the Confuls had, which was not permitted to the inferiour magistrates: they had also jurisdiction to examine any matter that was done within the hundred stone, after the yulgar supputation, within an hundred miles of the citie of Rome on euery side, Before the Dictator went twelve Lictors or Sergeants, who at the bidding of the Dictator and Consuls did arrest offenders, and commaunded strangers that met them in signe of reuerence to light from their horses, they caried in their hands an enligne of terror, a double poleaxe enuironed with a bundle of rods. The Dictator was caried in a chaire of estate, being clad with a purple gowne, edged with a crimfon border, and inuested with a robe triumphall, which were the brnaments of the auncient kings of Rometthe same attire had the Confuls and Prætors but the Prætors did weare a filuer coloured garinent, and did alwaies ride vpon milke white horses after the settle next place had the Cefors if there were any at that time, for they were in the number of principall magistrates, their office being not of perperuitie, no more then the Dictatorship. After these being the more worthie potentates, the inferiour fort of the authorized persons did immediatly follow. The first of that order were the Ædiles of the chaire, because they were conucyed to the senatehouse in a chaire ofyuorie, which monument of honour, as it scemeth was permitted vnto them, because in ancient times they were trusted and adorned with the entire regimet of the citie: thefe were created of the bodie of the Senatemext to them succeeded the Ædiles of the people, which were raifed to that dignitic from the roote of the people: after the Ædiles followed they which had borne office, though they oboays

A CLOTHOL SOR SHIT

were not charged with any office that prefent yearc, All of them federally marshalled accord ding to the worthinesse of their callings the Confuliant the Pracorialist the Adilitians the fall place had the Senators, which had not yetborne office. The number of them albim fuch an affemblie did some time antount to the number of fixe hundred all of them, thele onely excepted who were borne in chaires of estate, riding on faire pampered horses, and long trailed gownes, the skirts of which were gircumscribed with these words, Sendtus, populify Romanus V Vhen the Senators were placed; and outery cone began to expect with fixed de spoken against the rebellious confederares, M. Cicero aiming at Catiline with his eyes, did thus pierce him with his tongue,

& with this inde Dino deprooued his maners! www.Vasahereeuersleeneslogreatiandinatos Cicerobis gainit Cati- rious impudencie, grave fathers and worthie

"Senators, that a diffolute and diforderly re-" bellappotelloroliprodigalitie and washrifting " neffetamaimainer of the cuesibarrettors and

« feditious flaughterers, a proclaimed enemis a to temperalice, inflice, challing, & the whole fynodc:

woode of the four convertues has been drift appropriately ther a montignof prant domnacical birrichastym while soled as a standard sole of the sole facead phelono with his prophate persons & though the conspire against its systemion glass vs.co.gonfulti Foi confult (saidil) navite equi->> ceale his treghenie. Vi han should oha iay do >>> amongh swansportha owleamongh nightin-i» gales, or the vultur among ft among ft thouses, ... on Capiline amagb Cado esado wanak dreadim thathunder politivitien werfaethe lightening? and can we loue the traytor when we loud » histreasone Cantahous additionale, Chuiline, w that welmay more discounce thy down gast allays w there is no deed of thine, no idrift not denife, w which I have not heard, way almost seeing, nay, 20 almost felt. Here, here they be in this calinalism semblic (worthin Senators) in this most grand » and solemne councell of the world, which » muse continually of our death, of the downer » fall of Rome, and the desolation of Italien But " thouser lively Cariline, and yer thou lively » notto abate, but to abet thy pride, What was » nitio hath bene agany time ablent from thine »

THE ARIROT YBOOK E.

eyes a what villanie from thinchands? what >

IS COUNT HON O'R HAT expresident of vice frothy persons what young "gonnemathath there benealong time in this weitles who mes if he were once confusted by "the deceitfull baits of thy falle entilements setlipudidly not animate and incire either to "desperate at (display by carying the sword be-"foreimnyor to effeminate examples by bear "ring the torch before him, and yet thou ima-"ginefithanthy doings are not milliked. Of "thee Cuiline whom the Romanes keepo fo "leggethey prohounce sentente inhenthey "fuffer thy mildeedes they condemne them, "when they are at rest with themselves, they arear deadly wattewidt thee. But why am I " lo carnolt against theer is it possible that any " thing shold amend thee? may it be hoped for thatthou wiltreforme thy folfe; that thou wilt "thake off the faults? that thou wilt banish "thefe enormities! Thou are not of for good & « vertuous inclination, that honestie may rees claime thee from whoredome, feare from yn "iuffice, and reason from outrage: to this made " nesse nature hath framed thee, frowardnesse " hath exercised thee; and destinie hath refer! " ned thou, and for these deformities of thy nature

sure thou hast bene more feared then trusted, so and indecdo more willy then we have heretofore bene watchfull Buriat length moble s Senators, L. Catillna entaged with boldneffe, 33 breathing out bloudshed, preparing in most >> . hainous manner a scourge for his countrie, » threaming to this citic fite and swords is suffi-» ciently knowner and abundantly hated in Non plague can now be inuented of that moufter >> and horror of men within this citic against s this citie, but in that he hath hot drawne his > bloudie sword our of our naked bodies, in s that he hath left va aliue, in that we have wrested the weapon from his burcherous hands, ,, in that the civizens be fafe, & the cities fedure, 3 can ye confecture with what a bittemagonie, and anguish of mind he is vexed and if he be-,, ginne hereaftento renew his furie, take cou-, rage my Lords, and leade out against his bro- 3 ken and outcast band, the flower and the power of all Italie, and confider with what focs & wo deale, which fürfelving in banquetslient-3 bracing harlors, stuffed with meat; faint with & wine, adorned with garlands, foupled with, ointments, weakned by wantons; cast from; Runges

THE RAIKST BOOKE.

MOTOR TO A CONTROL OF THE TAX OF THE FIRST BOOKE. strates? These men building like gods vpon » entercontagious mounts the Hander of the the earth, as if their houses should be hea-, Meemious jouer whome I do hope there thanetica forebeaute destinies and that the pur wallbridge harb benefiting time due to williamoked luftand hod miou melle, is either st now minentor now approching: whom if # my Commillip do obaunce to quello because sociamor dure, it hall not procure a thornfun-"fhire of peace to the common weale, but "whole ages and worlds of tranquilities that "which may be healed by any incanes it will "heale by forme incanes; that which must needs # becuroff mustincedes curoff, therefore let them cither leane the citie or leave their tu-& multiporif they will hay both in this icitic land Minthismindilletthem looke fortheir defert st and affure themselves of the full measure of & ranenge; but if in stewes and tauernes they " foughtonely boluing and baudrie, they were "more to be spared, but yet wholly to be difse paired of: but who can tollerate that cowards should determine tracharid against the cou-Magious) wild braines against them that be wife, lottish drunkards against sober Senators sand fluggish drones against careful magistrates?

tiens, whilst they take their pleasure in sump- » tuous coaches, great families, costly ban-» quets, rich attire, and in the lewd companie » of lasciuious curtizanes, are fallen into such a » gulfe of debt, that if they would be free from » it, Sylla is to be raised from the dead. But they » shall soone perceive, if they still persist in their ». naughtinesse, that there are in this citie vigi-» lant Confuls, politicke gouernours, a puissant » Senate, that we have weapons, that we have an prison, which our auncestors have made a re-» uenger of hainous and manifest faults. And » now fith you are deliuered through my care, and industrie from a swelling cloud of terrors, » without battell, without bloudshed, without » armie, without fighting. For this fo great benesite noble Senators, I require of you no re-» ward of vertue, no enfigne of honour, no mo-» nument of praise, but an eternall record of, this very time: I desire that all my deserts, all » the ornaments of my person, the fruits of my » glorie, and the good æstimation of my dili-» gence, should be registred and enrolled in » a inyour memories. No mutenesse, no silence. a no secret whispering can delight me, by your « remembrance worthie Senators mine actes « & exploits shall be nourished, by your words a they shall grow, by your writings they shall « not onely receive life but æternitie.

Catiline his Catiline having all this while itching eares, inpudent answer to but a more itching toung, made in disorderly Ciceto. manner this disdainfull reply: I have a long « time maruelled and now with aftonishment " do wonder (ye noble Lords and ancient pro-"genie of kings) for as to the rest I will not bed "my selfe to them but against them, that with "so patient eare, and minds impassionate, ye « can digest the cholcricke railings of this rhe-" toricall parot, whome since we first promoted et from the pearch to the pinacle, from the bat a to the bench; from the ground whereon we " go, to the tribunall whereon we fit, the Senate " furfetting long ago on his rude and vnmaner-" ly speeches, is now constrained to make a diet « of a disease: woon me as ye have plainely per-" ceiued, he hath spent the whole chest of his "gall, who am as free from the crimes inten-" ded, as he is farre from the vertues which he ascribeth ascribeth to you. He thought perhaps (what » wickednesse I pray you hath he not thought) » to blow me out of the gates of the citie, by the » venimous aire of his impoisened lungs, but so maugre his malicious throat. I stand before, his lowring face, to the abalhment of his frozen forehead, and the confusion of his ill spea- 39 king eloquence, as one irreproueable, being » like a cage of chrystall, vpon which the more » poylon is cast, the more eleare it doth seeme, » Iam not made (Conful Marcus) of so fleeting , and brittle mould, that the gnashing of thyss teeth should either fray me or fret me: but if, Iwere guiltie of the faults alleadged, why was ,, I not impeached of them before thy Conful-» ship, but vnder the triumph of thy tearmes, must suffer this intollerable iniurie? Catiline, is an Epicure forfooth, because Cicero is a, Stoicke, Catiline is wanton, because Cicero » isicalous, Catiline is lawlesse, because Cice., roes will must be a lawe to him: Catiline is » prodigall, because he hath not bestowed any » bribes vpon Cicero: Catiline is rebellious, » because Cicero is foarefull and timerous: Ca-, tiline is an enemie to the common-weale,

CLOTHO, OR "because he is not friend to Ciceroes private " pollicie: mightie accusations and vnanswera-"ble! Hath he not drawne bloud (trow you) of "Carilines credit ? It grieueth me worthie Se-"nators, and trust me, it grieueth mine heart, "that the hope of the Romane youth, and the " sweet societie of gallant gentlemen your "selues atteding, bearing, & forbearing, should " by the spawne of a ragge be so hainously dis-"graced: as for his distempered declamation " it is no noueltie with vs my Lords, for it is the " vsuall methode of his mercenare toung, vpo "poore and pitifull presumptions, to hazard "the life and soule of his clients cause. But what " madnesse is it for one that is lately crept into " the citie to talke of antiquities, taking mat, " ters in hand which are elder then his memo-" rie, which were forgotten and dead before he " was begotten and borne? Thou art not aun-" cient enough Cicero to speake of our aunce." " stors, nor worthic enough to talk of our wor-"thies, thou art as a pilgrime in this citie, thou "artignorant of the orders and customes there " of thou seemest to wander in another coun-"trie, and not to beare office in the Metrapolis ofstalie: thou threatnest vs with extremities, ,, and layest on load with imprisonments, as if,, our bodies should be anuils to thine hatred; ,, but suffer not my sweet, mild and curteous, magistrates of Rome, that vpon Ciceroes, fuggestion we should endure such reproch: the ignominie of arraignment is miserable, ,, the arresting of guiltlesse men is lamentable, " banishment is discomfortable, but the rack-, ing, rowling, tearing and tormenting of men,, far be it not only fro the bodie of a Romane,,, but euen from his thoughts, from his eyes,,, from his cares. For mine own part I confesse,, and professe, and pretend, that Catiline li-,, uethnot to please, but to displease and dif., place M. Cicero, of whome when I speake, I,, speake of tyrannie, of villanie, of basenesse,,, and affure thy felfe Cicero, that either the law, of Rome, or the lawe of reason shall be my, warrant in this case, and to them that be dif-,, contented in this citie, thy fall will be a ge-,, nerall satisfaction.

Catiline departed out of the senate house continuing his furie, and because danger was feared, it was thought good that the Senate

CLOTHO, OR should be dismissed in the night time. Cariline went with a flender gard to the tents of Manlius, Lentulus, Cethegus, and diverse others that were privie to the conspiracie, and did as yet remaine in the citie, were arrested and imprisoned, and being conuicted by manifest euidence, were presently put to death. The day wherein the punishment of these traitors was decreed, did greatly illustrate & beautifie the worthinesse of M. Cato. He discended from M. Cato the Prince of the Portia familie, after whome this Cato in degree of discent was accompted and numbred in the third place. This M. Cato was of all the Ro-

The praise of M. Cato.

manes most sincere, and most like to vertue it selfe, and seemed in his iustice and integritie to be nearer to God then to man, who did not live honestly & orderly because he would seeme to be vertuous, but because it was against the course of his disposition to be dishonest and disorderly, thinking that onely to be reasonable, which was just and lawfull: he wasfree from fancies, and had alwaies fortune in his owne power: he was then Tribune of the people, young in respect of his yeares,

but in wisedome and aduise a father, & a right Senator, who (when others perswaded that the conspirators should be kept aliue in seuerall wards) being the last of them that senten. ced the rebellious, did inueigh with fuch force of mind and wit against the conspirators, that by the vehemencie of his speech he cancelled their opinions, which perswaded lenitie, and made their softnesse to be suspe-Acd: and the greater part of the Senate in fauour of Catoes gracious seueritie, did accoparie him to his house. C. Cæsar did at that clined to fetime giue some token of a rebellious humor, dition. whereof Rome tasted afterward too much, & himselse in the end was poisoned with the dregs. Catiline hearing what was done at Rome, gathered an armie, and making a laborious iourney through the steepe and craggie hils, intended a voyage into that part of Fraunce, which is beyond the Alpes: which Q. Metellus perceiuing, who was leader of three bands of foldiers in the Pice prouince, heremooued his tents and pitched them at the bottome of the Pistorian heath, fro which place the armie of C. Antonius was not farre.

Catiline when he saw that he was on euery fide embayed with mountaines & armed me, chose rather to fight with Antonius, who comitted the vantgard to the conduct of M. Petreius. Catiline in that battell gaue a sharpe onset, and continued the fight with an vndaunted stomacke, but in the end was slaine, and dying with great indignation, was there trampled to death by the hoofes of horses Thus he that did defend himself in the Senate house, was consounded in the field, and that by the justice of destinie, who with a scourge of steele followeth proud aspirers: this info-Hent Romane perceived at the time of his death the deceitfull glose of his fawning fancie, & the vaine fophistrie of bewitching ambition.

Tipe and family . Sal

งตัน ัก สรุธภาษาโดยสร้องเลื

LA-

LACHESIS,

Or the second Booke.

N. Pompeius for his great valor & magnanimitie iustly intitled Magnus, did in course of time grow to an exceeding greatnesse of authoritie, and had purchased through his worthie exploits, the loue, applause and admiration of the whole world, his father was Cn. Pompeius an approued fouldier, and a Consularian, his mother was Lucilia a Senators daughter: he was of a comely personage, not so commendable for beautie, as for a pleasing and constant complection, which continued even to his last houre, his wisedome was of a wonderfull excellencie, his life in all parts absolute, his eloquence but indifferent, he was desirous to have honour offred, but was not ambitious to viurpe it, a fast friend & arcligious observer of his word,

Sertorius feareth Pó-

in reconciling me that were at variance most faithfull, in receiving fatisfaction for offences most easie, neuer vling his power to impotecie, nor his wit to vanitie, from his cradle a fouldier, in his youth a conqueror trium, phant, and in all his warres couragious and dreadfull. For though Sertorius did more comend Metellus, yet he was more afraid of Pompey. And of the Spaniards he triumphed whenhe was but a Romane knight, not ha. uing as yet borne any office of estate. To be a knight of Rome was so much better then to be a common gentleman, by how much a patritian Senator was more honorable then a nouitian, whose auncestours were neuer of the Senate. And Pompey by degrees did endeuour to adhance his credit, and in the end by the conquest of many & mightie nations, became peereles. Mithridates his power was enfeebled by Sylla, dissointed by Lucullus,& broken in peeces by Pompey, after which viby Pompey. Ctorie he subdued the lewes, tooke their ci-Pompey en tie, and possess the temple of lerusalem, a rare and miraculous monument, which though he filled with his fouldiers, yet he restrained the

from

ple of leru-

from the spoile. In that warre he partly recouered, and partly subdued to the Romane power, Armenia, Colchis, Cappadocia, Cilicia, Syria, and all the region of Palestine to theriuer of Euphrates. He ouercame beside Paphlagonia, Galaria, Phrigia, Mysia, Lydia, Caria, Ionia, and all that part of Asia which lyeth about Pergamus. He committed the regiment of Armenia maior to Tigranes, the Island of Bosphorus to Pharnaces, Cappadocia to Arioberzanes, Seleucia to Antiochus Commagenus: to Deiotarus and other Tetrarkes Galatia with Armenia minor, to Attalus and Pylæmenes Paphlagonia, to Aristarchus Colchis, to Hircane Palestine. And for a triple reward of these his victories, he Pompey hohad the blazon of three triumphs: the first triple triwas of Affricke, the fecond of Europa, and umph. the third of Asia. After these triumphs ensued the Confulthip of Marcus Bibulus and C. Cafarhis o-Cæsar, issuing from the samous samilie of the Iulij, and conucying his discent from Anchises the Trojane father to Ancas: he was of ex. cellent beautie, and in vigor of mind most sharpe and vehement, in his rewards bountifull, in courage farre about mans nature, or mans beliefe, in the haughtinesse of his.

thoughts, in the celeritie of his fight, in the officers.

fuffering of bitter euents and casualties singular, in all his actions most like to Alexander the great, to Alexander I meane being sober, and neither surcharged with wine, nor ouercome with wrath, vling sleepe and meate not for the pampering of his lust, but for the continuing of his life. He was neare in bloud to C. Marius, and was Cinnaes sonne in lawe, neither during Syllaes Dictatorship could he by any means be moued to diuorce Cinnaes daughter, though M. Piso a Consularian, did for feare of Sylla funder himselse from Annia Cinnaes widow, by which constancie Cæsar did greatly endaunger himselse; for his death for by Sillaes Was fought for by Syllaes officers, Sylla himselfe being ignorant of their purpose. Cæsar being made Consul, a league of soueraigne focietie was concluded betwixt him and Cn. Pompeius, & M. Crassus. Pompey did therefore enter into that league, because he would haue his acts and deedes, which he had made in the prouinces before mentioned, that were conquered by him, fully confirmed and ratified by the Senate. Cæfar by taking that course had a double intent, to increase his owne honour by yeelding to Pompeis glory, and to establish his owne authoritie by charging him with the hatred of this treuirall power. Crassus had this drift to maintaine & preserve the æstimation which he had alreadie obtained by the power of Cæsar, and the authoritie of Pompey. There was also an af-finitie contracted by marriage betwixt Cæsar and Pompey: for Pompey tooke to wife Iulia marrieth Cæsars daughter. Cæsar had the regiment of with Iulia Fraunce committed to him by the Senate, af-daughter. ter whose Consulship ended, and before his departure into Fraunce, P. Clodius Tribune Clodius of the people began to giue new edge vnto Tribune of the people quarrels, and did with maine force bend him-becommeth selfe against Cicero. For what agreement seditions. could there be betwixt them, when their maners did so farre disagree? The head of dissention was cur off when Catiline was slaine, the bodie also was mangled when his confederates were put to death, but the serpents taile did as yet mooue: for Clodius did feeke by all meanespossible, to take reuenge on Cicero for the sharp scueritie vsed against his friends uenge himwhich were of Catilines seed-plot, and of that selfe vpon Cicero. seditious league. But it was to be wondred at, that a man convicted of so notorious and hainous crimes, durst proceede to such impudencie as to attempt the diffrace of M.

conquercd

LACHESIS. OR

Clodius infamous for adulterie with Pompeia Cæfars wife.

Cicero, or any way to disturbe his quietnesse. At that time Clodius was infamous for hisadukterie with Pompeya Cæsars wife, which amiddest the most religious & solemne rites of Bona Dea, this vnchast Tribune committed: and these ceremonies, which it was not lawfull for any man to behold, Clodius in womansattire did pollute. But he was the author of greater lewdnesse then this, when with his owne sisters he became incestuous, two of them being his sisters german, and married to two worthie Romanes, the one of them to Clodius infamous for incest with his fifters.

Q.Metellus, and the other to L. Lucullus, the third was his lifter by the halfe bloud, the wife of Q. Martius. For these and other his faults, Clodius co. he was condemned by the seuerall censures demned by of two hundred Senators at one Senion, and this notwithstanding was absolued: so that I do greatly doubt, whether the Consuls that did absolue him, or Clodius that was absolued, did more deserue punishment; for by that meane such a window of impunitie was then opened, as could not be shut in the space of many yeares ensuing. But Clodius because he was Tribune, and because he was Clodius, did thinke all time lost wherein Cicero was safe. He was then in great fauour both with the people and Confuls: for when any commoditie was fought for by the Confuls, which could not be prejudiciall to the people, he would labour earnestly for the Consuls, and when the people would have had any benefite which did not concerne the Confuls, he was wholly for the people: so that by displeafing neither, he pleased them both. Vpon this ground he adventured to make lawes, amogst which one was enacted against the who had put a Romane citizen to death without the iudgement of the people of Rome, which lawe though it ranne in generall termes, yet in sence and meaning it was directly levelled against Cicero, who in his Consulship had by Senate condemned the confederates of CaCicero mourneth. tiline. Cicero perceiving this did slad him felfe with mourning roabes, the Senators alin fo were attired with blacke, as the affociates of his forrow, the Romane knights did weare his colour, the inconsolate citie did droopen and deplore his state, and the forreiners that heard thereof did enlarge the griefe. For the redressing of this maladie meanes were made to Crassus, Cælar, and Pompey. But Cælari denyed to standagainst Clodius, because her feared that the lawes and decrees made by him the yeare next before when he was Conful should be disanulled and abrogated by Clodius if he maintained hatred against hims M.Crassus was monies weathercocke, and an hungric cormorant of coyne, and therefore refused to meddle in this matter, because they that craued the assistance of his authorities came not to him with golden faces: only Popey did helpe, countenance, & comfort him, and protested openly that himselfe would rather bessaine by Clodius, then Ciceroshold be abused: but the Consuls commanding the Senators and others to lay aside their mournfull sable, did so firmely lincke themselves to Clodius, Clodius both against Cicero and Pompey, that neither could Pompey profite him, neithe would Cicero stay in the citic. For how could he expect any better successe, L. Piso & A. Gabinius being Confuls, men of notorious naughtinesse, and raked out of the scum of Senators? V. Vherefore Cicero lest the city, Cicero comand in the very day of his departure, his house felse vothat stoode on mount Palatine was burnt by funtarie Clodius, and the soile was consecrated to Libertie: his goods were confiscated, his lord. ships and farmes bestowed upon others: there was a lawe also made touching his banishment, wherby it was prohibited that he shold A sharpelow not have the vse of water and fire within the cerning Cicitie, that none within fine hundred miles of cerohisba-Italie should receive him into his house, that none should make any motion for him to the Senate, that none should deliuer his opinion of Cicero, that none should dispute of that which was done, that none should speake of it, that none should go vnto him, that none should write vnto him. But in the end Cn. Pompeius hauing vndertaken emnitie with Clodius, being vrged by the earnest petition of Titus Annius Milo, and moved by the a

to Cicero,

bundant kindnesse of his heroicall nature, did in his mind make special election of this care to reduce Cicero from banishment. V Vherefore the yeare next ensuing, P. Lentulus and Q. Metellus being Confuls, Cicero by a Senatorie decree was recalled from banishmet called from banishment. With the great desire of the Senate, and the great reioycing of Italie. The ground whereon his house stoode, was exempted from religious confecration, and his house was not for shamefully throwne downe by Clodius, as it was sumptuously reedified by the Senate, his possessions were restored vnto him, and all Chodius per- the acts which Clodius made in his Tribunc. ship were adjudged to be void. Clodius did greatly indignate at the returne of Cicero, & hauing aggregated vnto him a rascall route of thriftlesse and vnconscionable ruffians, he partly draue away, and did partly maime and murder the carpenters and workmen, that were busied about the renewing of Ciceros to "he fought with Milo many times in the Clodkisbur- house, he burne beside the house of Q. Ciceffreets: he purfued Cicero with stones, clubs, Cicero, and fwords, & arming all his men with brads offire in the one hand, and swords in the other, led them to the burning of Miloes house: but this tempest and trouble of the citie, who did bestow kingdomes and take them away, and deulded the world at his pleasure, which burnt the temple of the Nimphes, that he might fcorch the rowle in which his shame was enregistred, which with masons, architectes, and measurers of ground did survey almost euery close and plot that lay neare vnto him, hoping in the end to make it his own purchase, and to dilate and extend his demeasnes from the gate of lanus to the top of Clodius the Alpess which threatned death to Sanctia threatneth death to amatron, as holy in her manners as in her sancia. name, and to Apronius a young gentleman, vnleffe they would fell vnto him their inheritance: who told Furfonius in plaine termes, that if he would not lend him fo much mony as he required, he would carie him dead into his house. This enemie I say to all good men, to his neighbors, to forreyners, to his friends, Clodius is to his kinfinen, was shortly after slaine by Mi-flaine by lo, for whose deathhe did lye in awaite, and Milo.

his bodie being conveyed to Rome was loathed of the beholders, for it was the harbour of a foule offridge.

Cælar was now in hot warres against the French, of whose exploits as they did happe. in nine yeares space, whilst he was President. there by the commission of the Senate, I will make a briefrehearfall as the times did yeeld

In the first years the Heluctians, when tians flyebe- Cæsar had scarcely set sonte in France, burnt fore Cæsar. their houses, and leauing their countriedis. persed themselues in the fields of the Sequani, and so came to the coast of the Tolossians. Cæsar perceiuing that their abode in that place would be dangerous to the citie of Tolossa, and being earnestly intreated by the petition of the Ambarrians and the Allobroges, who did complaine themselues to be greatly vexed and disturbed by the Heluctians, remooning his tents and having overtaken them at the river of Arraris destroyed in pursuite all the villages of the Tigurines. Cæfars horsemen which were sent before to obferue what waies and pathes the Heluctians did take, were by them discomfitted. After-The Helicand they gaue battell to Casar, and in that tians outerbattell they were ouercome, and yeelding come by themselues to Oæsars mercie, they were enioyned to refort to their owne countrie, and there to repaire their houses. Then Cæsar being moound by the complaint of certaine Frenchme addrest against Ariouista the king Casarpur-of the Germaines, whome he did pursue in against Aribattell to the river of Rhenus.

In the second yeare he waged battell a- Casar fighgainst the Belgians, the most of which were the Belgians flaine. The like successe had he against the & Neruians. Neruians.

In the third yeare fighting on the sea against the Venetians, he caused the to yeeld: and P. Crassus his Lieutenant did subdue almost all the countrie of Aquitania.

In the fourth yeare the Germaines passing with a great multitude ouer the river of Rhine arriued in Fraunce, whom Cæ ar affaulting on the sudden did vtterly destroy: then he made a bridge ouer Rhenus, and determined to vexe and exagitate the Germaines in their Cafar ouerowne countrie, because France was so much Germaines.

Cafarbur- disquieted and molested by them, & hausing lages of the burnt there many cities and villages of the Sicambrians, being also certified that the Britanes did minister succour, and gaue encou-

Cafar ouer.

Britaines,

Britaines.

ragement to the conspiracies of the French, he sayled into Britaine, and constrained the Britanes by sharpe onset to yeeld vnto him. the Brittains Cæsars nauie that transported his horse, was threwdly shaken with a tempest, wherewith the Britaines being revived betooke them. selues againe to weapons, and fighting with Casar were put to flight: at length they sued Cafar reco. to Cæfar for peace, which, he taking hostage cited to the of them did casily graunt, and returned into Fraunce, and the same yeare the Morines & Menapias rebelling he reduced to obediece.

In the fifth yeare Cæsar returning from Illyrium, to which place he went for the stopping and beating backe of an incursion made by the Pirustæ, came to his armie in Fraunce, and addressed warre afresh against the Britaines having broken truce, and enjoying there a prosperous fight, a great multitude of eth his war ogainst the the inhabitants being slaine, and a great part of the Island brought into the power of the

Romanes,

Romanes, taking hostages, and imposing tribute he set saile for Fraunce.

In the fixt yeare the Eburons did rebell against Cæsar, Ambiorix being their king and The Ebu-Captaine, who in many places Cæsar fiercely rous ouer-come by Cæ-and servently pursuing, put to the sword and san dispersed the remnat of that rebellious companic.

In the seuenth yeare Cæsar went into Italy, vpon occasion of a mutinic which there did befall. The French thinking that he would be detained by domesticall warre, and that it would be hard for him to returne to his armie during that dissention, began now to take aduise of renewing warre against the Romanes. The Carnutians professing that they would be leaders to that attempt bound others vnto them by oath, and having appointed a day they repaired to Genabis, where many of the Romancs did negociate, & were earnestly occupied and busied about their Treacherie trafique & merchandise, all which were slaine against the Romanes in by the French, which massacre being certain-Fraunce. ly reported at Aruernum and other parts of Fraunce, the Pietons, the Parilians, the CaCafar his revenge v-pon the re-bels.

durcians, the Turcus, the Aulerci, the Lemolo nickes, the Audians did ioyne in armour and did confederate with the Carnutians. Cælar hearing of this new enterprise made speedies returne into Fraunce, and having placed fe uerall garrisons in the cities of the Volscians, of the Artonikes, of the Tolossians, & in Narbo, which were nearest vnto the enemies, he? tooke Vellannodunum the citie of the Senones, & Genabis the chiefe towne of the Carnutians, which he spoiled and burnt, and make ny other townes did he take, and seised vel pon many of the rebels, receiving some of them into his mercie, & punishing very sharped ly the most notorious offenders.

In the eight yeare he pursued the Carnutians to their vitermost overthrow: the Bellofaci conducted by two valiant captaines Corbius and Comius, were enforced to submit themselves, and Corbius was then slaine by Cæsars horsemen.

In the ninth yeare Cæsar did not enterprise any warlike affaires, but laboured specially to cut offall occasions of revolting: therfore honorably emparling with the magistrates of the cities; bestowing vpon the gouernors great rewards, and burdening them with no new taxes; he brought Fraunce being wearled by many warres, to a perfect and perpetual peace, and departed thence to Italie; but was still garded with an armie of souldiers.

In the feuenth yeare of Cælars warfare in Fraunce, Iulia Casars daughter departed this world, and Pompeis little forme which he had by her, within a short space after died also, which was a great cracke to the concord before continued. Pompey had alreadie proroged his Præsidetship in the province of Spain Pompey his for five yeares: but the people of Rome did Prefidentexceedingly grudge, that either Cæsar or Po-proroged. peyshould in any forraine province have an armie of souldiers at their commaund, sith all warres both forreine and domesticall were ccassed & determined, because they thought by that meane some daunger might grow to the Citie: for Pompey being now in Rome, did rule Spaine by Affranius and Petreius his Lieutenants, hauing in seuerall cities seuerall garrisons, and C. Cæsar had in the bosome of Italie an huge hoaft, & had then a garrison

112 LACHESIS, OR at Rauenna, where he was personally residen this did feeme also inconvenient to many of the nobles, and Pompey shewed himselfe vo ry partiall: for he did fawne vpon them which would have had Cælars armie dismissed, but was very aduerle to others who would have measured him by the same compasse, who if he had died in Campania two yeares before the civill wars, where he was greatly affayed by sicknesse, at which time all Italie did make speciall vowes for his health, his glorie which was gained by sca and land he had caried vintouched to the graue. Ypon these consideral tions L. Lentulus and C. Marcellus being Confuls, a decree was made by the Senate, that within a time limited Cæsar should dis made by the Senare, that Crar fiold charge his armic, and if he would not, that he armic.

wold have bene made Conful in his absences but M. Cato did well answere, that no citizen ought to præscribe lawes to the common weale: wherefore it was ordained that Calar contenting himselfe with one legion, should beare only the title of the Presidet of France, and that he should come into the citie asa

should be accompred an enemie, for Calar

private

private man, & in his fuite for the Confulthip, thould wholly relye vpon the voices of the people. C. Curio an impudent oratour, a mã wickedly witted, and eloquent for a publike mischiefe, whose mind no riches could sarif. fie, nor any pleasures sufficiently please, who first stood for Popey (as it was then accompted for the common weale, which I do not speake to reprodue, but that I might not be reprodued) and now was in shew and apparance both against Pompey and Cæsar, but in deed and mind wholly for Cæsar: this Curio Tribune of the people, posted in hast to Rauenna where Cæfar was, and fignified vnto him the order of the Senate, applying his eloquence as a brand to the inflaming of Ca-Cafaris infars furie. Curio came to Cæfar at the en- curioa. trance of twilight, when the cloud of vapours gainst the and exhalations, is by nature disposed to turn meninto melancholie, which tooke so deepe hold on Cæfar, that making no answer to Curio, but casting himselfe on his bed he did in this fort exposulate with the Romanes. The passio-

THE SECOND BOOKE.

Thus is Cælar measured with a scantling, nate speech of Casar adieted with a paring, and rewarded with no- gainst the se thing Vanilli from me thou lad and vgly co. "cubine of Erebus, thou grimme and duskie " night, which with thy blacke circumference "doest hoodwinke our fences, driving the day "from vs before we can flesh our swords, con-"tracting our finewes when they are but new-"ly stretched, causing vs to lurke in our cabsons when we should cleaue to the throats of cour enemies, vanilli I say from me, and delay "not with thy lingering minutes my expedition "against Rome. Against Rome? othe ecchorof "my heart! nay for Rome, against the Ro-" manes, amongst whom is Cn. Pompeius Ma-" gnus, but not yet Maximus, for he lacketha "degree of that, and before he can attaine to si it there will be effution of bloud by fuccessio. But what eareth he for that, was he not one of "Syllaes whelpes, whose sword reaking with "Italian bloud he so greedily licked, that the "talt thereof doth as yet relice in his rauenous "and polluted lawes? But learne of Sylla, learn " of thy Sylla Pompey, that a tyrant bathing "himselfe in goare, shall at length sinke by the "weight of his cruelties. What Casar hath done Treferre to the Oracle of Bellona, what he will do I leave to the concealed decree of facred vengeance: what he may do, let the foredoming Parcæ prædestinate: what he ought to do let warlike instice pronounce Was not Pompey made Conful without fuing, without feeking, without speaking and ;, shall I requesting, yea and humbly requesting fuffer a repulse ? Fortune thou mightie and ; miraculous Goddesse, which in a moment, doest procure a world of varieties, whetting, with thine anger the points of our launces, shaking crownes and kingdomes, with the spurne of thy foote, triumphing ouer our victories with the speckled wheeles of thy vo-, luble chariot, controlling our hope with thy, frowning countenance: thou knowest great, goddesse, that if Rome hathat any time flou-,, rished: if it hath at any times tasted the pure,, and vnmingled extract of fincere happinesse, if it were euer caried on the brode wings of fame, if it did euer swim in a floud of plentie, ,, it was through Cæsar and his fortune, & yet, we are now dispised, and yet we will not be, despised; fortune is able to reuenge the; iniurie done to Cæsar, and Cæsar will, alwaics fight for the præheminence of his,

THE SECOND BOOKE.

125

LACHESIS, OR AND 126 es fortune. Therefore for the honour of Ances against the defacers of his race, for the credit e of mount Palatine, against the vniust magic s strates of Rome, for the glorie of Romulus « who shineth in the heavens like a giant-starre « against the seditious repugnants, I will shoot ethe fling of my wrath, and they shall well peres ceiue that Cæsar æsteemes no better of his « enemies, then if a fort of hares should be hare es nessed, which would trust rather to their feeto a then to their force: auaunt frome pitie thou « feminine passion, for I will deriue my name « of a martiallact, and wil be called a cædendo « Cælar, possesse therfore my heart thou dread. ce full Nemesis, ransacke my vaines, rage within e me wrath, affift me fiends, furies, and ye del a formed ghosts, subject to the scuere edict of ce premacie do deterre you from thence.

Casar in this rage of mind, carried away with the whirlewind of his turbulent spirit, left Rauenna and passed ouer Rubicon; the Senate hearing of his rebellion, decreed that

a the baser destinie, make your seats and circles

ein the walt of Italie, and neuer forfake that

" place, till the fierie brightnesse of Casars su

Pompey should be Generall, & that he shold Pompey is haue monie out of the common treasurie, appointed by the Senat There was present choise made of souldiers Generallathroughout all Italie, warres were proclaimed, and taxes were imposed upon the confines, suburbes and confederate cities. Casat having passed Rubicon seized vpon diverse townes of Italie, Pisaurum, Fanum, Ancona, Tignium and Auximon, and he ran ouer all the Picene prouince, with his armie which was for faken of Lentulus Spinther the gouernour there, and from thence he went to Cort finium, which was held of L. Domitius Ahe nobarbus, which he enjoyed having Domitia us also in his power, a most constant friend to Pompey, whose standard was at no time ad? uaunced, but it was worshipped and followed by Domitius: whome Cæsar did in this maner greet: Domitius I do franckly pardon Cafai parthee & all those which belog to thy charge, & minus with these words I make a perfect disclaime. of anger and emnitie, I give thee also free choise and election, whether thou wilt be a captaine in Cæsars campe, or still adhere to Pompey. Domitius not demurring vpon

Domitius flyeth to Pompey. Calars offer, did incontinent fly to Pompey? who was then at Brundusium, and there were many arthat time which did observe the like faithfulnesse to Pompey, to whom Casar did more plentifully offer the benefite of life, the they did thankfully receive it. Oxfar hafted to Brundulium to affault the Confuls in that place, but failing of his purpose he addressed toward Rome: there was then in the cities greatfeare and amazednesse, the people calling to memorie the crueltie of Marius, the matrons with their rented haire did display their fearefulnesse, the young damsels with falt teares did blemish their faces, their skrive king voices & deepe drawne fighs, did moue the heavens to a sympathie. The filly babes flying as it were from the face of Oæfar, did cleave to the breafts of their parents, the sturdiest necks did then begin to stoope, and the strongest hearts to melt, and nothing could beseene in Rome but signes of sorrow: for as the earth when she is disrobed of her budding and fructifying trees, and of her amiable yerdure, which is her onely grace and garment roiall, is like a naked table wherein nothing is painted, so was Rome at that instant being bereaued other young and lustic gentlemen, euen as if the springtide should be taken from the yeare; and a great deformitie did then alfoarise by the absence of the graue and auncient fathers, who with their spreading shadow did shield and protect the bodie of the citie, and did nourish the rising plants of the generous brasill, gathering strength and soliditie under the curtaine of their boughs. Cæfar having entred Rome, vsed all forts of menwith great kindnesse and curtesie, and having convocated an affemblie declaring and aggrauating vnto them the iniuries of his energy mies, he transferred all the blame vpon Pompey, and made a notable pretence, that he was desirous of vnitie, and that peace was the virgin of his heart. But Cæsars Diamond was nothing else but glasse, and his words nothing but wind, which at that present was clearely and euidently perceived, for he went! in great hast to the temple of Saturne, where the treasurie of Rome was before his ransack inuiolably kept, and at the gates of the temple L. Metellus Tribune of the people did boldly relift him, and with thefe words entertained him and the of opinion his initial baile

Cælar.

Metellus his Calarthe lawes of Rome haue made this place facred, thou shalt not enter into this

" remple but through the sides of Metellus, & of no coine shalt thou carrie from hence with-

" out bloudshed: vnsheath therefore thy blade; " and feare not lest thy wrongs be espied: for

" alas we are now in a desolate citie, there be

" fo few to condemne thy doings, that there "be almost none to see them: thy private and

"rebellious fouldiers shall not have their pay "out of the treasurie of Rome, and if thou wole

" dest be rich by violence, there be strange wals

"for thee to batter. Cæfar in this fort replied vnto him.

"Shamelesse churle as thou art, this right "hand shall not youch safe thee so much honor

" as that thy bloud may shine vpon a souldiers "steele. Metellus, thou art not worthic of my

"wrath, and where thou hoissest up the saile of " lawes and customes, assure thy selfe Tribune

" that the lawes of Rome had rather be cancel.

"ledby Cæ ar, then confirmed by Metellus.In the end by the earnest intreatie of his friends, who were addicted to Casar rather for feare then contrarietie of opinion, Metellus gaue place to Cæfar, and he rulhing fuddenly into Cæfar feithe temple, caused the treasurie which in ma-surie ny yeares space was leused by polles, which was gained in the Carthaginian war, and in the victories had against Philip Perseus, and Pirrhus, together with the tribute of Alia, of

Creet, and the wealth which Cato brought from Cypris, and which Pompey purchased by his warres, being caried before him when he triumphed, to be laid on affes backes, and to be caried as the finew and supporter of his warres. This was thought the fowlest act that euer was committed by Cæfar, and it was neuer feared that Rome shold be poore by Cæ.

far. This captaine being as gladforthis new. bootie as some of his friends were sorie, led his souldiers toward Spaine, where Afranius Carfar marchechtoward and Petreius did rule the affaires vnder Pom-Spaine. pey, but he did so masserate them with famine that he possess the greatest part of Spaine, without shedding many drops of bloud: then he went into that part of Spaine, which is now called Andeluzia, where M. Varro captaine

· LACHESIS, OR

THE SECOND BOOKS.

to a great number of Veteranes, did hold a forcelet, but he being daunted with the presence of Gæsar, resigned all the prouince into his hands: the he marched toward Dirrachio. taking by the way Orichum and Apollonia an Vniuerlitie towne, where his Nephew O. Ctauius was taught at that time in the liberall artes and sciences, who is said to have accopanied his vucle in the warres following, but because it is a tradition of more antiquitie then credit, I do rather note it then affirmeit. The fortune that Cæsar had, and the credite which Pompey enjoyed in forraine nations, were two enticing lures, that drew to their feueral campes a great multitude of forrainers. To the assistance of Pompey from the coast of were readic Greece which lyeth about the rockes of Cyr-

the affifiace rha, and the clouen hill of Parnassus, camea great armie of the Phocenseans, from Thebes and the regions thereabout came the Bæotians, the Pilæans, and the Sicanians: from the townes that lye under Mænalus and OEte

> Sellians: from Creet and Gortyna a number of good archers did present themselves to Pompey:

came the Dryopes, the Threspoti, and the Pompey: from Dardania, from Colchis, and the shore of the Adriaticke sea, the Athamats, Enchelians and diverse others: besides these flocked vnto him thousands from Babylon, Damascus, and Phrygia, together with the Idumæans, Tyrians, Sidonians and Phænicians: there came also from Tarsus, from Cilicia, from India, Persia, Armenia, Arabia, and Æthiopia. For the aide of Cæsar there came The ftraun. many Scythians, Hircanians, and from di- gers which were offictate uerfe regions beyond the hill Taurus: like-to Cafar. wise the Lacedæmonians, the Sarmatians, the Lydians, the Essedones, the Arimaspians, the Massagires, the Mores, the Gelonians, the Marmarians, the Memnonians and they that dwell beyond the pillers of Hercules were readie in armour and shewed themselves ser-

came to Dirrachio, and partly to encourage the Romanes which did follow him, and to make the cause of the vndertaken warre mauiceable to Cæsars commaund. Cn. Pom-peius partly to welcome the straungers that nifest to them all, the Nobles and Senators sitting round about him in harnesse, vsed this speech vnto them.

Pompey the Titlet it not any whit diffnay you friendly rebellious, faction of C., Marlus, L.

oration to his souldness forceiners, and faithfull harted Romanes, that "you are now farre from the wals of the taken "citie, and if the Italian ingenuitie, and the Sheate of the Romane bloud be as yet warme within the Romanes, let them not marke v-"pon what earth they stand, so they stand vpon "the ground of a good and lawfull quarrell. It is I trust enident to you all that we are the Se "nates for if we were in the vimost climate of "the world, and directly under the freezing " waine of the Northerne Beare, yet in our " hands should be the administration and regi-"ment of the affaires of Italie. Vyhen Camil-"lus was at Veios Rome was there also, and "the Romanes for saking their houses, did no " uer chaunge their lawes. Now is Rome Ca-" fars captille, and a fort of forrowfull hearts " hathle there in hold, emptie houses, silent "lawes, and close courts: we are here as the pu-" nilliers of Cafars faults, and the armor which " we now beare, is but onely the wrath of re-" uengefull Rome. Cæfars warfare is as iust as "Catilines, and when he should be like to the Scipioes, and the Marcelli, he falleth into the rebellious rebellious, faction of C. Marius, Lepidus, Carbo, Sertorius: and yet in truth I honoun, him too much to confort him with these . He 33 maketh accompt of me as of one withered, halfe dead and foredone with yeares; but it ;; is better for you to have an ancient captaine, ,, then for Cæfar to leade an armie of spent and ... outworne Veteranes. And though the age ;; which hope doth follow befarre more plausi.,, ble and acceptable, then that which death, doth pursue, yet wisedome and experience ... proceede from elder times, & the head whose , haires resemble the feathers of the swan is a Senarehouse to a good armic: And if I may, notbea fouldier, yet I will be the example of,, a fouldier vnto you. The æstimation that I ; haue alwaies had amongst you Romanes, by ,, whose meanes I have bene extolled to that, honour, aboue which neuer any Romane ci- 35, tizen did ascend, may warrant my warfare. VVith vs also are both the Cosuls, with vs the ,; armies of many forraine kings & potentates. ;; Is Cæsar trow you so venturous, because he ;; warred to log against the vnruly French? why ,, it was but a sporting practise, more sit to 35

"traine his fouldiers, then to merite triumphy sor hath his fortune against the Germaines " railed his courage, he went not so speedily to "the Germaines as he departed from them, "and rather fearing them then feared of them, "he called the Germaine sea the whirlepit of "hell? or doth his bloud begin to boile within "him, because the same of his surie did suddely "drive the Senators out of their houses and "harbours? VVhen I displayed my blazing en "figne vpon the Ponticke sea, the Ocean was "no more traced with the pirate ships, but they "did all crowd into a narrow corner of the " earth. Mithridates that vntamed prince, who "long expected when victoric should flie from "Rome, I enforced to take his pauillion, in " which he died like a fugitiue coward, & there "in I was more fortunate then the most fortu-" nate Sylla. There is no part of the world with "out my trophees, and what land soeuer lyeth "vnder the funne, hath either bene vanquished "or terrified by Pompey: and I have left no "warre for Cæsar, but this which now he main! "taineth, in which though he ouercome, yet "heshall neuer triumph. VVheresore the near rer Cælar doth approch vnto you, the more let your courage rife, or if words cannot preuaile, imagine that you are now vpon the » banckes of Tiber, and that the Romane ma-, trons standing upon the wals of the citie, with me fireaming teares, and dispersed hairelockes, do exhort you and intreate you to fight: Ima- :> gine that our of the gates of the citie the old, and grayheaded fathers, that are not able to ; weild weapons do prostrate vnto your feeten their hoarie heades, requiring succour and defence of you and thinke that Rome her felf.» fearing a tyrant boweth vnto you:thinke that » the infants which are alreadic borne, & which » hereafter shall be borne, have mingled their» common teares, and that they which as yet? neuer saw the light, desire to be borne free. and they which do now live defire to dy free: » and if all this will not serue, then Pompey (if » he may so debase the maiestie of a Generall) » with his wife and children will fal before your » feet. Butthis is my last behest that I require of » you, let not Pompey who in his youth hath," alwaies honored you, be dishonored through » your default in his dying yeares, for your »

DACHESIS, OR a felues, for your kindred, your freedome and egood effate. I protest thus much that I will «neuer returne to Rome but I will carrie peace a in my hand; and the Olive braunch shall be! a my enfigue. The Romanes were greatly emboldened hearing these words, seeing their Generall to youthfully minded, & as it were refined in the mould of Mars. VVherefore they expected Casar with prepared minds And Calar having now prafe acd governors ouer Orichum and Apollonia, made great hast to Dirrachio, in which place at his first Pompeyput comming Pompey gave him the onset, and teth Casar made him to flie having lost a great part of

M. Antonius his armie: and though M. Antonius came not helpeth Gz. longafter to Cz ar with a fresh supply, ready to face and breft the enemie, yet Pompey did "fo plague the with continual warring against them, when he hiw coue nient time; that Car fars victuals being almost wasted, he was faind through penuric of corne to flye into Theffa "Hi, and Pompey speedily pursuing him in the champion plaine of Pharfalia, pitched his tents directly against Cæsars. In Pompeis campe all things were glorious magnificenty and glittering in shows in Casaus all things powerfull, active, and strong. The Romanes being thus deuided both parties were greatly enflamed with delire of fight: Pompeis fouldiers were readie to deprine him of the ensignes, and to enter the field without a Genetall: so deliberatine was that noble Captaine of their welfare, and so desperate were they and carelesse what befell vpon them. In Pompey there was this defire and thought to on uercome with as little bloudshed as might be. But what fiends and damned spirits diddest thou inuocate Caius Cæsara what Stygian fu. ries, what infernall hagges, and what nightly terrors didest thou intreat? to what Eumenides diddest thou sacrifice, intending such a generall flaughter. Pompey being earnestly viged by his fouldiers thought good to marshall his men, and to fet the armie as might be most convenient for the soile whereon they were to combate. The left wing of the armie Pompey marshalleth was committed to L. Lentulus, the leading his armie. of the right wing had L. Domitius, the strength and middest of the battell did whollyrelic vpon P. Scipioi vpon the bankes and fides of the rivers did march the Cappadocis ans & Ponticke horsemen: in the brode field were Tetrarches, Kings, and Princes, and all the purpled Lords that were tributarie to Rome: Pompeis squadrons were furnished with many Romanes, Italians, and Spaniards. Casar seeing his enemics to have discended into the plaine, was heartily glad that fo good occasion was offred him, and that the day was come which with a million of wishes he called for: wherefore departing out of his tents and marlialling his fouldiers he made toward Pompey. In this battell, the fathers face was directly against the sonnes, the brother was preparing himselfe against his brother, the vncle was the first that levelled at the nephew, and he that did flay most of his kindred was accompted most couragious. V Vhen the trupers denounced the warres, and gaue a figne The Castari of fight, the Cæsarians did fiercely give assault ans give the to the Pompoians. The force and vigor of the warre did conflit in the launces, speares, and fwords, which Pompey had well prouided againft, by loyning the targets one with ano ther, fo that Cæsar had much ado to breake

the array: but fearing lest his foremen should faint, he caused the transuers legions to follow his enfigne, who as it were with a fidewind aduenturing vpon Popeis armie, stroke them downe on each fide so fast as they went. The barded horse being incensed with the heate of the warre, his heart being boared with the point of the speare, exempted himselfe from the reine. The Barbarians being not able to restraine them gaue way to Cafar, and the forming steede being now the regent of the field, the fight was confused and disordered: for vpon whom the dart did vncertainly light, leauing their horses perforce they lay groning and groueling on the earth, till the hoofes of the arrearing coursers did crush the veile of their braines. Casar was now come to the heart and center of Pompeis armie, but the night drew on which made both sides pause: Cæsar did thanke his souldiers, and gliding through enery troope and band of them, he did put nourishing oile into their burning wrath. He tooke view of their fwords, curioufly observing whose wear ponwas ouerflowed with bloud, and whose

th

142 CHESIS, OR MISS was dipped at the point; whole hand did tre ble and whose was stedfast, who changed the countenance through feare, & who through furie, and casting his eyes on the prostrate carcasses, frowning upon them with curled forehead, as not yet satisfied he fed his irefull lookes with the desolate aspect of his slaine countriemen, but if he perceived a gaspe in the flesh of his owne souldiers, he would endenourto close it vp with his hand, & giving them words of comfort and encouragement did fooner heale them then indeede they were healed. At the dawning of the day next ensuing, and at the first entrance of that mornings bloudie houres, when the welkin had put aside the vizard of the night, the starres being couered and the earth discouered by the Sunne, Cælargiuing his fouldiers new swords; new darts, speares and launces, and awaking their courage), giving them also to vnderstand with the point of his launce, in what part of the aduerse armie the forreine kings, the Confuls, the Senators, and the nobilitie were placed, directed them as it were

by aime, to gage the bodies of many exceller

men,

men, who entangling their weapons in the intrals of these noble enemies, did throw to the ground & to extreme ruine many princely potentates many reuerent persons were buried in goare: many of the Lepidi, of the Metelli, of the Coruini and Torquati: but a. mongst the rest the fortune of Domitius was dolorous and despitefull, he as before hath bene said, was once pardoned and dismissed of Calar, but now was fingled out by Calar and gricuously wounded, bur yet for great was his mind that he would not stoope to begge a second pardon, whome Cæsar looking vpon like a tyrant, and feeing him rowle, his fainting members in the moistned dust, did with this bitternesse infult, giving him the scornefull gaze: L. Domitius now I hope at speech to length you wil for sake your maister Pompey, Domicius, hereafter I trust you will practife no enmitte against Cæ ar. But as good fortune would, he had as yet breath enough to replie in theso few words, Cæfar I dy a free man, and [go to the region of Proferpina, not feeing thee as a conquerour, but as yet inferiour to Pompey, and euen at my death am I refreshed with this

LACHESIS, OR hope, that thou livelt to be subdued by the rigor of destinie, which wil take revenge both

for vs, and for thy sonne in law. Hauing spoken these words his life fled from him, and his fight was taken away with a dreadful dark

nesse, by whose wounds so much bloud was not lost, as there was glorie gained. For he

gaue a cleare token of an honorable mind,

accompting it a great deale better to have

THE SECOND BOOKE.

dignitie without life, then life without dignitie. But Cæfar thinking nothing to be done if any thing were vadone, ragingly and earneftly did sceke for the person of Pompey, & rushing into the thicke othis souldiers, neuer stretched out his arme without deaths ward rant, and neuer looked backe but when he faw none to fight withall. Pompey standing a farre off on the top of an hill, seeing the fields to swimme with bloud, and the Romane Senate to be nothing now but an heape of carcasses, and that his owne decay was sought for by the bloud of a multitude, resetuing himselse to some better fortune, forsooke the field and fled to Larissa. Cæsar perceiuing it, Pompey flieth to Lathought it better to give some rest to his armic, riffa.

mie, then with a fudden pursuite to make after him: wherefore he retired his fouldiers, & came to Pompeys tents. When the wandering night was chased fro the interiour illands by the recourling day, and the Sunne had in parted his brightnesse to our vnder-neighbors, and the dreames were readie to possesse the Theater of the fancie, the wearisome creatures of the world declining to their rest the Cælarians having ransacked Pompeis tents, and refreshed their fainting bodies with the viand there left, betooke themselues to their case, and reposed their wearied limmes in these plots which the Pompeians did before lodge in. But how shall I describe the deformitie of that night, in which hell did breath, out the ghosts of them that were slaine, the aire was infected with contagious vapours, and the starres trembled at the beholding of the vincouth Stygians? Sleepe did bring no quietnesse vnto them, but slames, murmurs, horrors, and the hideous founds of the skri- and visions king Harpies. The ghost of the slaughtered of the Casa-Romane did appeare vnto them, and every mans fancie was a fiend vnto him: some did.

thinke that they beheld the image of a young man, some of an old man, others did dreame that their brothren were come to take reugge. on them, but in Ozsars mind were all these terrors: the flaine Senate did seeme to encon passe him on all sides, brandishing their fierie fwords, sweating, frying and dropping with rosen and sulpher, and the greatest torment of all was a guiltie conscience. He was now molested with the powers of hell, when his enemies that survived slept quietly in LariffaiPompey after his mishap in Pharsalie made Pompeytra Pecdic voiage toward Egipt where Ptolome did raigne: for Pompey having procured the restitution his father to the throne of Egipt, and with many other finguler benefites hating deferred his fauour, thought that the young Prince in a kind regard wold have entertained him according to his honour and desert: but who doth busie his memorie in recounting benefites and who will thinke him. selfe beholden to one that is diffressed? and when doth not fortune chaunge friendship?

Prolome, vnthankfull Ptolome, disleagued

with the senslesse litargie of soule ingratitude, when by certaine report he heard that Pompey had approched to the shore, sent out his dire and dreadfull messengers to deprive the aged bodie of the vnuanquished mind. And when Achilles that bold butcherer did with his glaine portend the last end of his daies, Pompey whose excellent qualities might encline a massagite to mercie, craued with constant countenance but a word or two of them, and as for life he was content to leave it: the fauage helhound would scarcely condescend to this request, but at length his tygers heart yeelded, and Pompey in few words wishing to the Romanes libertie, to his wife comfort, to his sonnes safetie, was beheaded by these Pompey is beheaded by mercilese Egyptians, and his head was born the Egyptias as a present to Ptolome, which was farre too good a present for so lewde a prince. But how false was this world to Pompey, who had not now earth enough for his sepulture, to whom before the earth was too little for his coquest: but rare is that bird whose feathers do not moult, and happie is that man whose glorie doth not eclipse. Cæsar made hast after Pompey with an hore and carnest pursuite, not knowing that he was preuented of the prize which he aimed at and as the beafts which nature hath placed in the wildernesse, when poore pilgrimes walke by their solitarie and vincouth dens, runne all together with one rage, hunting their footsteps, every one thinking to purchase the pray, the Lion, the Leol pard, the Beare, the Beuer, the Tiger, the Luzerne and the V Volfe, making the woods to ring with hollow outeries. Solthe Gæfarians did enquire and make after Pompey, amai zing the seas with sounding trumpers, drums, fifes, and shawmes, and neuer ceassed their pursuite till they were arrived in Egipt, where Cafarenter they were rotally enterrained of Cleopatra the Egyptian princesse, who with complaint rand mournfull melodie, did allure Cæfar, ad miring her fingular beautie, to tame and fuppresse the pride of Prolome, who had then deforced her from her foueraigne estate. Cafar did not deny this faire Oratresse, having

Egypt,

alreadie perfwaded him, if her toung had bin

filent. Mars spent a long time with Ventis, and

before his departure from thence Cleopatra

was another Calphurnia vnto him . But why do Iname Calphurnia & For what proportion can there, be betwixt a chast matron and a shamelesse ourtizan. Czelar labouting to refore Cleopatra to her former dianitie was fuddenly affaulted by the king of Egypt with Cafar is acfaulted by an huge armie, land in that warre he was drie the king of uen to many extremities, the conduit pipes were cut a funder, and he was belieged on euery side being as yet in Cleopatraes pallace, but in the end wrastling out of these missortunes, he gaue battell to the Egyptians at Pharoes, and conveying himselfe into a gallie for the defence and safegard of his fleete which was griduoully tost; he was so vexed and shaken by his enemies, that he was faine to leave his gally, and swimming a great way in the riuer of Nilus, returned with great dif- Gasar swim-ficultie to his armie, but at the last rencoun-river of Nilus tring the Egyptians at Alexandria, he put the king and his whole armie to the sword; and in these warres was burnt the notable librarie of Ptolomeus Philadelphus, but much against Cæsars mind, who as he was specially learned fo he made special accompt of that monument of learning, Cæsar hauing raised Cleotained of Cleopatra.

patra to her prillinate roialtie departed from Egyptandhastened toward Vtica, but in the way being enformed that Pharnaces the foil of Mithridaces, whome Pompey when he had finished the warre against Mithridates, had made king of Bosphorus, had subtracted from the Romanes, and atchieued to himself Cap.

Cafar ad-dreffeth atus: Calar sent against him Domitius Calui gainst Phar-nus, whose armie was discomfitted by Pharnaces. Cafar did then in person make expedition against him, and assaulting him at Zo padocia, Colchis, Armenia, and part of Pon-lia, caused him at the first joyning of battell to Cafar put. flye, and having entred Bosphorus, he was teth Phirna. flaine of Asander the author of his invasions.

VVhileft Cæfar was marching toward Vtica, M. Cato disdaining to receive life at the hads of Cælar, and greatly perplexed in mind that man to rebellioully bent should have to M. Cato kil prosperous fortune; did with violent hands leth himselfe determine his daies. Casar having taken Vtica as he was returning to Rome, did en counter P. Scipiq on the feas, who feeking by countreth P. all warlike meanes to preserve the slender

sparckle of his dying life, was at length slaine, and Cæ ar fayling from thence enshoared in Sardinia, and making no long carriance in that place, came the fine and twentieth day of that moneth, which beares his name at this day to the citie of Rome, where he was welcomed with such applause, such gratulation, with such melodie, with so rare banquets, and with fo gorgious shewes, that Pompeis death was not bewailed with halfe so many teares, ashe was entertained with loyes, and for the fealing of their good affection towards him, they did grant to him by a fourefold triumph to enlarge his fame. A triumph was a most ex- What thing cellent honour, which the captaine who by was among the Romans battell had our come his enemies, returning the Romans with his armic into the citie did at the first englishmed. loy by the decree of the Senate, and afterward by the confent of the people. It was called a triumph, because the souldiers did cryo along the streete as they went to the Capia tolle, lo triumph. Surely the Romanes did

greatly advantage themselves by the vsing of these triumphes, for by them men were animated to warlike exploits. But many thinke

a common-weale then onely to flourish, whe

And

it hath peace and plentie, but being moved with the present face of things, and not forecalling the leguelegiber lip into excour, and fofter incheir minds fond opinions, for plen tie breedeth fecurities fecuritie warre, warre desolation. I he state of a countrey is then to be tearmed prosperous, when it is throughly furnished with men able and sufficient to'repulse forgeine forces, with the prouentions of the earth, and other treasures of husbandrie. Buthow canst thou assure thy selfe of free and peaceable into ying of the riches of thy countrey the space of one moneth without militarie discipline? For all regions except those which are situate vnder the extremitie of the climates, are enuironed with the circumference of other nations, from which warre may arise as easily, as the windebloweth from the foure quarters of the world, in which dange! rous accident the first and last refuge of humane helpesisthe soldiers arme. Doubtlesse the Romanes were exquisite in all heroicall deserte but in their bountie and beneficence to fouldiers incomparably excellent: for they knew, that the prouinces and Ilands adjacent could not be wonne by home fitting, or by a treatie of words: but they must gird their armour confront their enemies, and exchange bloud for bloud, and when these countreyes were conquered, & they had tasted the sweet of the vintage, which the fouldiers had gathered, they did not reward them with sower grapies, neither powred they vineger into their wounds, but assigned vnto them pensionarielands, for their maintenance, and making the franke allowance of ample rewards, encouraged them with crownes of glorie, triumphs, honors and dignities, so that victorie flourished there where armes were fauoured. Surely Princes & potentates ought with tender indulgence to respect the infatigable paines of the fouldier, lest he murmur and say when he goeth to the fight, I shall either be ouercome, or flaine: and so be wholly subject to the will and disposall of mine enemie, or else be partaker of the victorie, and returne into my country, as into a pitched field, where Ishall fight with penuric, contempt and vnthankfulnesse, the last of which being either in the enemies chaines, or in the number of his dead men, I should never have felt. Burif the fouldiers industrie be not quickened and stirred vp by bountie and reward, he hath no more will to performe any part of martial feruice, then a dead coarse hath power to arise out of the grave. For what can be more precious to a man then his bloud, being the foutaine and nurse of his vitall spirits, and the ground of his bodily substance, which no free and ingenuous nature will loofe or hazard for nothing. And in truth there is great ods in the cuent, for the souldier may either be slaine and so die without receiving of his salarie, or else be wounded and die vuder the cure, and foreceive his slipend to the halfe part. This account being thus cast, it falleth out that the fouldier loofeth all or some part, & the Prince who is his pay-mailter, faueth either all or fome part. And who focuer shall argument of discourse upon sound reason, and infallible experience, may eafily proue and conuince, that these commo weales have most prospered, which have liberally maintained and had in fingular regard militarie artes. The mentioning of Cælars triumph hath occasioned me to vie this digression. This word Triumphus is deriued of the Greeke name of Bacchus selaucos, who having subdued India, was the first inuenter of this honor. Of triumphs there were two forts observed of the Romans, one the graund triumph, which by præheminence was called Triumphus, the other was the pettie triumph, and was commonly called Ouatio, of these triumphs some were done on land, some on sea, some in the citie, some on mount Albane. It was therefore called O. uatio, because the victoriate souldiers returning from the fight did showte, and double the letter O. An Quation did much differ fro a triumph, because he which came into the citie by way of Ouation, was neither caried in chariot, nor cladde with robe triumphall, nor with any ornament of estate, neither did his armie march before him when he was entred the citie, neither was he crowned with laurel, nor brought in with found of trumpets, but walked through the citie on foot, his head being adorned with a mirtle crowne, his foul. diers following him, and the shawmes onely founding. How the great triumph was cele-

X

LACHESIS, OR brated, may be perceived by this of Cælars which was thus performed.

Cæfar his triumphs described.

Caius Cafar fitting in a rich and fumptub ous chariot; bordred round about with the crownes of Princes, his upper garment being of purpled tiffue, and bespanged with lines of gold, his victorious armie marching before him garnished with the spoiles of Europa and Affrick, his captines being boud with chaines, which were tied to his chariots taile, did represent a wonderfull maiestie to the gazing people: the trumpets and the clarious did Crears first found on each side. His sirst triumph displaied with a most radiant standerd, the spoiles and conquests which he had in Fraunce: the images of Rhodanus and Rhene were wrought in filuer, the streames were curiously deciphed red, and the waves did feeme to rife with a naturalland reall flowing. In the fecond aris cond with umphillood the citie of Alexandria, and after it the armes of vanguished Prolome were blazed, the river of Nilus was painted with a faire calestiall blew the azured waves being compacted of costly glasse. In the third triumph was a maske of Ponticke mourners, & the the coarle of Pharnaces was then carried in triuniph: vpo the top of the coffin stood a triple plume, on the one part of which was written VENT on the other VID 13 on the third VICI. In the fourth triumph Affrike went as captine, Cafare and the person of Juba king of Mauritania, his impliarmes pictured as hauling mannacles of them was then also resembled. For his victorie at Pharfalia there was no triumph, because Popey was a Romane. VVhen Rome with smiling countenance had beheld these shewes, Casaraccompanied with the Romane nobilittle entred the Capitolle, and there with spiced fires and fragrant odours did facrifice to lupiter. After his thankes, vowes, and prayers perfourmed, he returned with the great apage plause and admiration of men, and amiddell other sofemnities, Crispus Salustius did greet him with this Oration.

I know that it is a difficult and hard matter Saluftes to giue counsell to a king, or Emperour, or to Casa. any man that is highly aduaunced, because " they have store of counsellers, & there is none " fo wife and warie, who can give certaine ad-" uise of that which is to come. Againe, bad?

LACHESIS, OR

« counselles are manie times better liked then er good, because fortune dallieth in things, and " fancy in men according to their pleasure. But " I had a great minde in my youth; to handle " matters of flare, and in knowing of them I be-"Rowed great labour and trauell, not to this " end onely, that I might obtaine some place of « dignitie in the common-weal, which manie " by cuill artes and volawfull meanes have co-" passed, but that I might also fully know the « estate of the common-weale, as well in peace " as in warre, and how much by munition, by "men, and by monie it could do. Therefore " toffing many things in my mind this was my " resolution, to præserre thy dignitie Cæar be-" foremine owne fame, and modellie, and to « purany thing in practife to I might procure "glorie to thee. And this I did not rashly or so " flatter thee, but because in thee amongst the « rest, I find one skill very maruellous, that thy " mind hath bene greater in aduersitie, then in « prosperitie, But with others it is a matter of « more accompt and reckening, that men be " fooner wearie with praising thy valor, then "thy selfart wearied with doing things worthic of praise. Surely I hold it for a rule, that no-,, thing can be fet from the depth of invention, ,, which is not readie to thy thought. And if ,, this purpose should onely raigne in thy brest, to deliuer thy selfe from the surie of enimies, ,, and how thou maiest retaine the fauour and, good liking of the people, thoushould do a,, thing vinworthie of thy vertue. But if that, mind be as yet resident in thee, which from, the beginning disturbed the faction of sediti-,, ous men, which brought the Romanes from, the heavie yoake of servitude vnto libertie, ,, which without weapons did confound the ar-35 mies of thine enemies, whereof haue enfued,, fo many and fo glorious actes both at home, and abrode, that thy foes cannot complaine,, of any thing but of thine excellencie, then re-,, ceive from me such things, as of the summe, or state of the common weale I shall deliuer: ,, which doubtleffe thou shalt either find to be, true, or elle certainly not farre from the truth. There is no man brought vp in a free chate, ,, who doth willingly yeeld superioritie to ano-,, ther, and though the mightier man be by na.,, ture of a good and mild disposition, yet be-,,

" cause when he will he may be wicked and in-"iurious he is therefore feared: which hapneth " because many great men are peruersly min-« ded, and thinke themselves so much the sater, "by how much more they do permit other me « ouer whom they rule, to be wicked & vniust, "But furely a contrarie course should be taken, " when the Prince is good himselfe, to labour " and indeuour likewife to make the people " good. For every bad fellow doth most vnwil-" lingly beare a gouernour, but this to thee "Cæsar is of greater difficultie, then to others "who have ruled before thee; thy warre hath "bene more mild then the peace of other me: "besides they which did ouercome, do de-" maund the spoile, they which are ouercome " are their fellow citizens. Through these diffi-" culties must thou passe. And strengthen the "common weale for succeeding posteritie, not "by weapons; nor as against enemies, but which is farre greater and more difficult, by "peaceable meanes. Therefore to this point "the state of things doth call every man either "ofgreat or of meane wisedome, to ytter as " much good as he can concerning this matter.

Formine owne part this I thinke, that as by, thee the victoric shall be qualified and orde-,, red, so shall all things follow. Thou diddest,, wage battell noble Cæsar with an excellent, man, of great power, and desirous of glorie, a ... man of greater fortune then wisedome, fol-,, lowed by some few, enemies both to thee & ,, to themselues, such as either affinitic did draw,, vnto him, or some other bond of dutie: for, none of them was partaker of his dominatio, pompey which he could not rollerate. For if he could could not haue brooked an equall, the world had not brooke an bene set on fire with warre: but because thou, art desirous to establish peace, and vpon this, anuill thou and thy friends do continually, beate, consider I pray thee of what nature the ,, thing is whereof you confult. Certainly I have, this conceit, that because all things which, haue beginning must haue end, when the fate,, and determined lot of destruction shall fall, vpon this citie, that our citizens will contend, and make warre against their fellow citizens, and so being wearied and consumed will be-,, come a pray to some forraigne king or nati-, on: otherwise, not the whole world, nor all,

" the people vider, the arch of the heavens be-" ing mustred or assembled together, shall be "able to shake or crush this flourishing com-"mon-weale. Therefore the good effects of "concord are to be maintained, and the cuils « of discord to be banished and driuen away: " that may easily come to passe, if thou abridge "the licence of riotous spending, and iniurious « extorting, because young gentlemen in these "times are inured to such a fashion, that they "thinke it a glorious matter vainly to mispend "their owne goods and the goods of other me, "denying nothing to their owne lust, norto "the shamelesse request of their leud compa-"nions: and their reftlesse mind having entred "into a crooked way, and dissolute course, whe "their maintenance faileth them, and wonted "fupplies are wanting, do conceiue a burning " indignation against their fellow citizens, and " turne all things out of course. In that commo-" weale all things are well ordered, where offi-" ces and dignities are not fold, and where am-"bition enjoyeth not the rewards of vertue: "this and all other cuils shall cease when mony "shall cease to be honoured; where riches are precious, precious, there all good things are vile: faith, ,, honestie, modestic, chastitie, because there is ,, but one way to vertue, and that is hard and rough, but to mony there be many smooth,, waies: it is gained as well by cuill as by good, meanes. Couetousnesse is a sauage and de-,, uouring beast, immane, & intollerable: which,, way so euer it wendeth, it wasteth, & destroy-,, eth townes, fields, temples and houses: it min-,, gleth holy and humane things together: nei-,, ther armes nor wals can stop the course of it., It spoileth and bereaueth men of same, chil-,, dren, countrie and parents: but if thou debase,, the high accompt of monie, the force of co-,, uetousnesse by good manners will be abated.,, I have by reading found, that all kingdomes, ,, cities, and nations have so long enioyed a,, prosperous estate, whilst true aduise did pre-,, uaile in them: but when soeuer fauour, feare, " or pleasure was the sterne or motiue of their, counsels, then their wealth was first diminish., ed, next their dominion abridged, and lastly, ,, their libertie impeached. VVherefore I be-,, feech and exhort thee renowned Cæfar, that, thou wouldest not suffer such a goodly domi-,, "nion as this to be tainted with rust, or by diff « cord rented in peeces. If that thing happen, "neither night nor day will appeale the storms softhy mind, but by dreames being rowzed from thy bed, thou shalt be chased and pur-" fued with continuall cares. I have dispatched " in few fuch things as I accompted honorable "for thee Cæsar, and necessarie for this comsmon-weale. The most part of mento judge "ofothers, haue sufficient conceit, at least in "their owne conceit, and to reprodue an other "mans deeds or words, every mans mind doth "burne with desire. They thinke their throat "is not wide enough, nor their toung glibe-"nough to poure out of their breafts their ma-"licious exceptions, to whose censure that I am "fubica, doth so little shame me, that it would "have grieved me to have bene filent: for, "whether it shall please thee to follow this " course or some better, I shall not be mooued: " sith I have spoken as much as my barrennesse "could bring foorth. It remaineth for me and "for vs all to wish, that such things as thou shalt "in wisedome effect, the gods would prosper. Cæsar asterward to match his soure triumphs, was made the fourth time Conful: his statue The great also was placed amongst the statues of the honors be-auncient kings; in the Senat-house there was Casar. a throne of inorie made for him: in the theater his roome was such, as it contained pleafure, pompe, and cost: his image was exquifitly painted in the Orchester, a place wherein the Romaine gentlemen did vse to daunce and vaut: the moneth of July was then also cofecrated to lulius, as the moneth of March is to Mars. Cæsar did not rest in these honors, but thought still to propagate his same by warlike exploits. VVherefore hearing that Popeis sons did raise great tumults & vprores in Spaine, he made great hast thitherward, & at the towne of Siuill opposed himselfe to Cn. Carfar figh. Pompeius one of the sonnes of Pompey the teth with Cn. Popeius Great, who was constrained to flye, but La-the younger at the citie bienus merhimat vnawares, and hauing ofsiuil. slaine him, brought his head to Cæsar. Sex. Pompeius his brother escaped by flight.

KEREKEKEKEKÉ ATROPOS,

Or the third Booke.

He warre in Spaine being

quickly dispatched, Cæsar

returned to Rome: and the Cafar.

Romanes did redouble his bestow many honours, for he was presently made Dictator perpetuall, Censor perpet tuall, Consult for ten yeares, and Emperour of Rome: he was called also the father of his countrie. But Cælars fortunes did foone after begin to decline, and these diverse colouredtitles were but as reinebowes, which do glitter gallantly for a time, but are suddenly extinct: his fatall hours was now approching, and enuic stayed in the cloudes expecting his end. But as a mightie and huge oake, being clad with the exuuials and trophes of enemies, fenced with an armie of boughs, garnished with a coate of barke as hard as steele, despiseth the force and power of the windes, as being onely able to dallie with the leaves, and not to weaken the roote; but the Northerne wind that strong champion of the airie region, fecretly lurking in the vault of some hollow cloud, doth first murmur at this aspiring oake, and then doth strike his crest with some greater strength, and lastly with the deepest breath of his lungs doth blow vp the roote. So vndoubtedly was it with Cæsar, who disdained seare, and thought it a great deale better to die then to thinke on misfortune: but destinie is no mans drudge, and death is euery mans conqueror, matching the scepter with the spade, and the crowned king with the praissesse praisses p then Cæfar, so nothing was more notable, then the death of Cæsar: for his dearest frieds became his greatest enemies, and their hands plucked him downe, whose shoulders did lift him vp. Many causes were pretended of the The causes of the conconspiracie bent against him, the honours piraciebent which were bestowed vpon him, being both far. manic and great, did cause him to be enuied of the Nobles: and likewise it was a matter of cauill, because sitting before temple of Venus genitrix the Senate comming to him to confult with him of great affaires, he did fit and welcome them, and did not rife vnto them: another occasion of quarell was, because M. Antonius would have set a Diademe vpon his head the fourth cause was, because he depriued Epidius, Metellus, and Cesetius Flauius of the Tribunelhip: fiftly it was greatly murmured, because it was constantly reported, that L. Cotta Quindecomuir that is a côtemplatiue reader of Sybillaes prophecies, would pronounce sentence, that because it was contained in the prophecies of Sybilla, that the Parthians could not be ouercome but by a king, therefore Cæfar should be highted the king of Rome. For these causes a conspiracie being railed against him, in which the chiefe agents of the Pompeians, were M. Brutus and C. Cassius, and of the Cesarians D. Brutus and C.Trebonius, in the Ides of March, and in the Senate-house, which was called Pompeyes court, he was pierced with three and twentie wounds, which because they were many, and most of them were in the belly, and about the midrife, Cæsar as ashamed of such wounds, did let downe his robe from his shoulders to couer them, and fell as a facrifice under the statue of Cn. Pompeius Magnus, M. Antonius M. Antonius is spated at and other friends of Cesar, were spared by the the time whe adulse of M. Brutus, lest they might seeme ra-staine. ther to be authors of a faction, then of Casars death. After this bloudie exploit, they by who he was slaine, held the Capitolle. I cannot give Brutus praise for this, but I rather thinke that he deserueth dispraise: for had the cause of quailing him bene iust, yet the course & maner of killing him, doth apparantly seeme vnlawfull: for by that act the law Portia was bro- The law Porken, by which it was prouided, that it should the killing of not be lawfull for anie to put to death anie ci., Cafar. tizen of Rome indicta causa. The law Corne-Thelaw Corne-India Work lia de maicstate was also violated, by which it by the kelling was made high treason, for any man to take a- of Casar. nie aduife, or make anie conspiracie, whereby a Romane Magistrate, or he which had a soueraigne power, without iudiciall proces might suffer death. And that ancient law was also despised, by which it was forbidden, that no Ser nator should enter into the Senate house armed with any warlike weapo, or hauing about

THE THIRD BOOKE.

Cæfar is flaine in the Senar-house him anie edged toole. Surely they that will end tumult with tumult, can neuer be seized of good successe or fortunate euet: for discord may breed, continue & augment contention, but it can neuer end it : and to expect that all differences should be calmely compounded by generall accord, is a thing not much to be hoped for, because it seldome happeneth.M. Brutus, the chiefe actor in Cæsars tragedie, was in counsel deepe, in wit profound, in plot politicke, and one that hated the principality whereof he deuested Cæsar. But did Brutus: looke for peace by bloudshed? did he thinke to auoyd tyrannie by tumult? was thereno way to wound Cæfar, but by flabbing his own conscience ? & no way to make Cesar odious, but by incurring the same obloquie > VVillanie man speake vnto me of the wisedome of Brutus, when he thinketh vpo the field of Philippi, wherein Brutus was like to the Comet, who feeding vpon vapours & vaine opinions, at length confuncdand confounded himfelf and thus were the two Bruti, I meane the first and the last, famous men of that honourable name, both fatall to the estate of the Romane Common-

Common weale: for the former of them did expell the last king of the Romanes, and the later did murder their first Emperour. But if Cæsars death had bene attended, till naturall dissolution, or iust proceeding had caused it, his nephews entrie into the monarchie might well haue bene barred and intercepted : because these honors were annexed and appropriated to Cæsars person. And if patience might haue managed their wisdomes, though there had bene a Cæsar, yet should there neuer haue bene an Augustus. But by bloudshed to seeke for peace, is by oyle to quench fire. VVhen any innouation or alteration is to be hatched, the state of things must be quiet and secure, that the wheele may be easily turned about, without hearing any noise. For to commit the murder of a soueraigne Magistrate,& to defend thy selfe by armes, is as if a man should couer himselse by water from a showre ofraine, or should descend into some hollow of the earth for avoiding of infectious aire:& if the most barbarous and immaine tyrant, should trecherously, that is without warrant of iustice be slaughtered, though at his death he were viterly destitute of friends, yet his enemies should be sure to finde enemies: for no comoniweale can be without men of aspiring humours, and when fuch a murder is wrought they find present occasio to tumultuate, knowing that Anarchie breedeth confusion, & that ivis best fishing in a troubled streame: making aglorious pretence to revenge the death of a Prince, though in heart & in truth, they beare greater affectio to the monarchie remaining, then to the Monarke who is taken away: neither in regard of supreme power and præheminence; will I put diversitie betweene the person of a king and a tyrant; for he which attaineth to an imperiall or regall four raigntie, by warlike industrie and victorious exploit, is no lesse a Monarke, then he which cometh to it by election, succession or descent: & he that is made subject by sword, is as much subject as he tharby birth is a denison. But was Iulius Cælara tyrant? Surely there was more tyrannicintheslaughter then in the manssaine: Cofar I graunt was a traitour to the State before the victorie, but after he exchanged that base name, with the best title of dignitie, and of a traitour traitour became an Emperour: yet did he not aggrauate to himselfe that type of honor, the people offred it vnto him, he accepted it with thankes: manie had offended him, he pardoned them, year ewarded them with great boutie. He was content to haue a fellow Consull, he suspected none of them which were the workmen of his death, he did neither depresse the Noble man by flauder, nor advance them of obscure condition by flatterie and bribes: & which is incopatible to tyrannie, he shewed felt-will innothing, when he was inuested with supremacie; but questionlesse the Romanes should not have nourished this lyon in their Citie, or being nourished, they should not have difgraced him. The goared body of Ce- cefarhis bofar was honourably transported to Campus die is trans-Martius. Afterward M. Cicero because he was Capus Mardesirous to restore peace, and to reconcile the states, procured a decree to be made after the example of the Athenians, which they called their Amnestia, that the killing of Cæsar shold beforgotten & forgiuen, and this was ratified by Senate. But the conspirors would not in an nie wise lay aside their armour, vnlesse they might haue certaine assurance and securitie that their persons, lands, and goods should be fafe and vntouched. V. Vherefore for pledges they had the fonnes of M. Antonius, & M. Lepidus, and then they descended out of the Capitolle. C. Octavius hearing of the great change that had happened in Rome, came as some say from Epirus, as others from Apollonia, to whom I rather agree: but he was welcome to all sides and sectes. And by the testament of his vncle, who had adopted him to be his heire, he tooke the name of Iulius Cafar. M. Lepidus was at that time made Pontifexmaximus in Cæsars place. The Senate did affigne the prouince of Syria to Dolabella, and Macedonia to Antonius: but afterward when M. Antonius did thew himself too imperious, and would have refigned his charge in Macedonia, and haue bene Præsident of France, he suffered a repulse of the Senate, wherupon he appealed to the people, which did greatly in-incenfed acense the Senate against him, and Octavius Octavius be- was also grienously displeased with him, becommeth an cause crauing his assistace against the enemies

of his vncle, he was in grosse & odious termes abused

abused of Antonius: Octavius therefore by the affent of the Senate, being accompanied with his vncles veteranes, prepared warre against him. D. Brutus to whom the province of France was committed by Cæsar, and after his death confirmed to him by the Senate, that he might result Antonius, who was then making toward Fraunce, came with an armic to Mutina, and there suffered him selfe to be be- D. Bruius suf fieged. The Senat did afterward fend messen-fest him gers to Antonius, to treate with him of peace, fieged by An which were L.Pifo, L.Philippus, and Seruius Sulpitius. But when they returned without cocluding any thing, warre was proclaimed, and Hirtius being Consulwent against him, Octauius as Proprætor, Pansa the other Consul solowed them within a few dayes after. Cæsar and Hirtius having brought Bononia into their power, did pitch their tents neare to Antonius, who leaving a sufficient armie to beate them from the wals of the towne wherein his forces were, did privily and closely go from thence to meete with Pairfa, as he was coming to Bononia, with whom he entred battell, and M. Antonius had a prosperous victorie, but as he was retur- fighteth with

Hirtins fight

ning to his tents, Hirtius opposed himselfe in the way, and curtalled his victorie, doing vnto him as great a damage as he did to Paula: for which cause both the Consuls and Casar, were called as well of the Senare as of the foldiers Emperors, although Pansa had but bad successe, and Casar did not fight at all. But

ATROPOS, OR

The two Co- shortly after there was a great battell fought unis fight a betwixt these three and Antonius, in which battell Antonius being constrained both to leaue his tents and armie, fled into France to Lepidus Proconsul. Hirtius after the victorie being fore wounded, died fodainly in his enemies tents. Pansa not long after died of a wound also at Bononia. Brutus and Mutina being deliuered from siege, only Cæsar escaped fafe, and enjoyed a most glorious victorie. The father of Cælar was C. Octaviusa prætorian, and Atia was the daughter of M. Atius Balbus, and Iulia the sister of Iulius Cafar, and being adopted of C. Cefar, and made his onely heire, he was called C. Iulius Cafar. Oftanius be- Octanianus. After these warres he became

Antonius.

commethan an enemie to the Senate, because they had affoorded a triumph vnto D.Brutus, and had made made him Generall in the warre against Antonius, who stood onely vpon the walles and doing nothing, did onely behold the fight, passing by Octavius vnregarded, who had deliuered the Common-weale from danger; alleaging that it was but a sconce and colour to bestow vpo him Consul robes & to make him Prætor ten yeares before his time, which was to bestow the kernell vpon others & the shell vpon him. And to trie them further he Octavitus his request to fent to the Senate, to request them, that he the Senate. might be made Conful in the place of one of them which were flaine: & because he could not obtaine it by petition, he determined to purchase it by warre. Therefore reconciling Octavius rehimselfe to M. Antonius and M. Lepidus, he coelleth him selfto M. Antonius and M. Lepidus, he coelleth him selfto M. Antonius and M. Lepidus, he coelleth him selfto M. Antonius and M. Lepidus, he coelleth him selfto M. Antonius and M. Lepidus, he coelleth him selfto M. Antonius and M. Lepidus, he coelleth him selfto M. Antonius and M. Lepidus, he coelleth him selfto M. Antonius and M. Lepidus, he coelleth him selfto M. Antonius and M. Lepidus, he coelleth him selfto M. Antonius and M. Lepidus, he coelleth him selfto M. Antonius and M. Lepidus, he coelleth him selfto M. Antonius and M. Lepidus, he coelleth him selfto M. Antonius and M. Lepidus, he coelleth him selfto M. Antonius and M. Lepidus, he coelleth him selfto M. Antonius and M. Lepidus, he coelleth him selfto M. Antonius and M. Lepidus, he coelleth M. M. Lepidus, he coell led a great armie against the Citie, and sent tonius and messengers to the Senate in the name of his Captaines & fouldiers to demaund the Con-· fulfhip of them: who when they had moued the matter to the Senate, and the Senate was in a great doubt what to do, Cornelius a Ceturion that was the principall messenger, laying his hand vpo the hilt of his fword, in great boldnesse said vnto the, this shall do it, if you will not do it. The Pompeians were in truth wedded to too much partialitie, for why had Brutus the glorie of triumph, vnlesse it were because his life was saued by other mens valour? And why were the bodies of Pansa and Hirtius folemnely and honorably enterred, and Cælar who was living, & partaker of the victorie nothing regarded? Nay they did apparantly despise him. For, sending messengers they enjoined them to parle with his foldiers and leave Octavius vnspoken to: but they did with great choler answer, that they would not heare aniething valeffe their Ge+ nerall were present. This peruerse and preposterous dealing made Octavius to enter the City in warlike maner, and as an enemy vnto them, and there he made himselfe Consul, & Q.Pedius his colleague. M.Cicero did then in publike affemblies greatly commend and extoll Octavius, but he spake one thing and meant another: for if dangers had bene once past, Ciceroes tongue would have turned anotherway. VVise and circumspect he was to preuent a mischiese, but timerous & searefull to withstand it when it was befallen. Afterward ward affinitie was contracted betwixt Antonius and Cæfar, for Cæfar tooke to wife Clo- Cesar taketh dia the step-daughter of Antonius. He was wife. Conful before he was of the age of twentie yeares, and in that Confulship held nothing in to curious charge, as to take renenge vpon the enemies of his adoptive father: wherfore he requested Q. Pedius his colleague to enquire of them by whose conspiracie he was flaine, and thereupon M. Brutus, C. Cassius & D.Brutus being absent were condemned. D. Brutus to whom the Senate had committed the dealing with Antonius, being for saken of D Brutus is hisarmie fied to Aquileia & was there slaine. slaine. But the estate of the Common-weale at that timeshall appeare by an Epistle of M. Brutus written to C. Cassius, which I have here set downe: whereby a man may learne how to moderate and demeane him self in common calamities, whe justice is turned out of course and the lawes are filent. It was to this effect. M.Brutus to C. Cassius sendeth commenda- 5, tions; according to couenant & promise my » Cassius, I write vnto thee such news as I haue,, received from Rome. Octavius as I heare, ,, Aa 2

179

doth greatly commend Octauius.

be

ATROPOS, OR "hath maried himselfe to the daughter of Ful-"uia the wife of Antonius, for which mariage. "I'am neither verie glad, nor greatly forie:ma-" nie vse such mariages as pledges ofreconci-"liation, and thinke them of sufficient force to "change hatred into loue, but are greatly de-"ceiued. For it is one thing to make alliance, " and another to make amity, fith they proceed " from seuerall causes, and having a different " course, must needes produce diuerse effects, " for alliace groweth, by bringing one kindred "to the marches of another; but friendship ei-"ther by long conversing together, or by a "grounded opinion of good desert, or by like-"nesse of qualities where there is no inequality "of estate: and he that seeketh friendship out " of these præcincts, will neuer find it. Therfore "by fuch mariage emnitie will not fully cease, " nor friendship firmely be setteled : for it is "rather a meane betwixt these two extremes, "then either a mother to the one, or a step-"dame to the other. I received letters lately writethes from M. Antonius, directed to vs (whereof I

"haue sent you here inclosed a copie) verie Brutus & contumelious, minatorie, and not worthie to be fent from him, to vs: but his threatnings I.» do nor much regard. For amongst free men » the authoritie of him that threatneth, is no » more, then the law wil permit: for mine owne >> part I could wish that he were great in the » Common-weale, so he were honest. I will not » prouoke him to emnitie, but will alway præ-» ferre the libertie of my countrey, before his » friendship: he object ethro vs often the death » of Cæsar, but he should consider how small » a time Cæsar raigned, not how litle while he » liued. And Octauius forfooth digesting at» length, the hollow conditions of his father in » law, seemeth greatly to stomake that we bost » fo much of the Ides of March, when notwith->> standing only one man was staine : yet not so » much as he vanteth of the Nones of Decem-> ber, at which time he slaughtered more then » one. Cicero once thought that the Commo- » weale as a naked orphane should be prote-» cted by armes, but now he præferreth an vn- » iust peace before a iust warre: wherein he » sheweth how vniust he is the is fortunes page, » and fauoureth them most who have most fa- » uourers. A wife man, though by oportunitie »

Aa a

. .

"he do alter his pace, yet still keepeth his way, "ferueth time for advantage not for feare, and "as the sunne setteth to rise againe, so he chan-" geth his course to continue his purpose: but " to an vnconstant man euerie accident is a co-" stellation, by which he is diversified and dri-" uen from the center of his thoughts. Though "Ocauius call Cicero father, vie him kindly, "praise him, thanke him, yet it wil appeare that "his words are contrarie to his meaning; for "what is more auerse from common sense, the "to call him father whom he will not fuffer to "be free? By these lineamets I have shadowed "vnto thee my Cassius the ficklenesse and lu-"bricitie of Ciceroes variable mind, which as "it is not certaine to himselfe, so it is not safe to "vs: let him live as he doth adulatoriously and "abiectly: to me which am opposed to the "thing it selfe, that is, to a kingly regiment, ex-"traordinarie rule, domination and superiori-"tie which would extol it self about the lawes," "no subjection can be such as that I may brook "ir. There can be no valiat norfree mind with-"out constancie, neither can any thing be glo-"rious without the judgement of reason. In the businesse.

businesse of the common-weale I would have ,, nothing done, without the constitution and, decree of the Senate and people, neither will ,... I arrogantly prejudicate, or boldly retractate, that which they shall hereafter do, or hereto-,; fore haue done, but I accompt it more confo-, nantto the good estate of the comon-weale, ,, rather with pitie to mollifie the miferable e. ,, state of distressed persons, then by graunting , euerie thing to the desire of the mightie, to, inflame their lust and infolencie. Surely the, Senatours are many times deceived in their, hope, and if a man haue done one thing wel, ,, they presently yeeld and permit all things, vnto him, as though a minde corrupted by,, their largesse, and liberall offers, might not,, be traduced and caried away to euill purpo-, fes and attempts: but they may not bestow, any thing which to men euill disposed may , be either a præsident or a protection, and I, am afraid that Octavius by his late Conful-, ship, do thinke him selfe to have ascended, higher, then that he will descend: for if An- » tonius by the death of Iulius Cesar tooke pre- » fent occasion of tyrannising, how much more ,,

« will Octavius vsurpe, when both Senate and se people do applaud to his affection. Neither " will I commend the facilitie and prouidence " of the Senate in this behalfe, before I haueful experience, that Octavius will content him-" selfe, with the ordinarie honors that he hath "receiued: butifit otherwise happen, I must "needes pronounce the Senate guiltie of the "fault, which they might well haue præuented. "Yet if this yong man do lay aside sinister and " affectious humours, and imbarke himselfe in-" to the comon cause with impartiall thoughts, "Ishall then thinke that the Common-weale will be able to support it selfe, by her owne "ftrength and finewes, that is inflice and inte-"gritie; and that thenceforth, no offence, shall " either be cruelly reuenged, or dissolutely re-"mitted. Of our future affaires this is my de-"terminate resolution, so it may obtaine thy "approbation; if things happen to be in better "plight we will returne to Rome, if the estate "be as now it is, we will live as now we do, in " voluntarie exile: if it decline fro bad to worse, we must flie to armes as our last and worst re-" fuge, wherefore Cassius do not faint, nor dispaire, dispaire, let the hope of good things encou-, rage thee, vertue onely is confident. From, Smyrna 17. Kalend. April, Cæsar when by no meane he could be reuenged of Brutus, who was Præsident of Macedonia, and Cassius who had the regiment of Syria, he sent for M. Antonius and M. Lepidus who were then in France, and they three meeting at Bononia, had conference of ordering and disposing the common affaires, and there they agreed to be Treuiri, for the constitution of the common-weale for five years space. To the charge of Lepidus Spaine and Gallia Narbonensis were alotted, to M.Antonius the other parts of Fraunce, to Cæsar Libia, Sicilia, and Sardinia. After these confultations they came to Rome, and affigned offices to whom it pleased them, asking no leaue either of people or Senate. At that time many excellent Lords and Gentlemen were profcribed, together with an hundred and thirtie Senators, among whom was L. Paulus the brother of M. Lepidus, L. Cæsar the vncle of Antonius, and he who did so much praise Cicero is put Octavius M. Cicero. But that was done by to death.

the venimous rancor of Antonius; by whole meanes he was beheaded, and the head was forteful dea ferued in mease vnto him, which when Fuluia ling with Ciecroes tong, the impudent wise of Antonius had espied, plucking and renting from the chaps his golden tongue, the distained it with the spittle & fome of her mouth, she pricked it with necdles, launced it with her nailes, brayed it with herfist, racked it with her armes, and stamped it with her feete. Foolish and senslesse anger, to inflict reuenge vpon a thing that was fenfleffe, and for the milliking of the man, to hate the dead part of his body. But thou didft nothing Antonius (for the indignation of poster ritie will rife against thee) thou didst nothing by taking away the publike voice of the City and that all-pleasing tongue. Thou hast dispoiled Cicero of a poore remnant of dayes, thou hast pared away his old age, thou hast caused him to be slaine, when he wished for death, but his fame and the glorie of his vertues and excellent learning, thou art so farre from abridging, that thou half augmented it: he liueth and shall liue by the memorie of all ages, and whilst the frame of this world shall stand, stand; and this bodie of nature shal continue, which that onely Romane did in minde contemplate, by wit understand, & by eloquence describe, the commendation of Cicero shall alway accompanie it, the fucceding wits shall wonder at his writings, & euery mans doome thall condemnethy cruelty. But the miserie of these times none can sufficiently deplore, so vnpossible it is to expresse it by words. But this is to be noted, that the care of wives toward their husbands, that were proscribed, was maruellous, & in the highest degree: the fidelitie of their free-men but indifferent, the loyalcie of their bond-men very slender, the loue of their children none at all, so grisly and loathsome is aduersity to a mans owne bowels. Cassius hearing of the great tumults of Rome, went from Syria to Smyrna in Asia, where M. Brutus was, to take aduise of the ordering of the battel against M. Antonius,& C.Octavius, who they heard did make expedition against them. V Vherefore Cassius hauing ouercome the Rhodians, and Ariobarzanes, and Brutus having subdued the Patareans, the Lycians, and other nations of Asia, which did before molest them, they hasted to Macedonia that they might there wage battell. And thither not long after came Cæsar, and M. Antonius with a huge host, and before the citie of Philippi they faced their enemies with the tents, That fight was verie fierce and very doubtful, for Brutus put Cæsar to flight, and Antonius Cassius, and each of their tents was ransacked of the victor, C. Cassius when Brutus, who he feared was slaine, returned a farre off, with his horsemen, thinking that they were the enemies that pursued him, did worke his owne death by the hand of one of his retinue. V Vithin a few dayes after M.Brutus being ouercome in another battell, and ouerborne with despaire, enforced Strabo that fled with him to flay him with his sword: which act, many noble Romanes to the number offortie did imitate. There were neuer anie to whom fortune did sooner approch, the to Brutus and Cassius: and neuer anie from whom she did more suddenly flie: Cassius was the better Captaine, Brutus the better Counseller, Brutus was more to be loued, Cassius to be feared, because the one excelled in vertue, the other in valor. VVho if they had conquered in this fight, it would have bene more expedient for the Romanes to haue bene ruled by Brutus then Cassius, by how much it was more safe to them in the end to be gouerned by Octavius then Antonius. The yeare following there grew discord betweene Cæsar and L. Antonius Consul, and Fuluia wife to M. Antonius. They were offended with Cæsar, because he shared that part of Macedonia to his fouldiers which M. Antonius should haue had. Fuluia was the more earnest against Octavius, because he had coceiued a deep displeasure against her daughter, and had thereupon divorced her. Cæsar was likewise incensed against Antonius, because he would not send to him that supply of fouldiers, which he ought to haue. Antonius therefore in his brothers quarell, maintained warre, Fuluia leagued vnto him held Præneste, and there she behaued her selfe as the other Consul, cotemning P. Seruilius who was indeed Conful, being like to a woman in nothing but onely in fexe: L. Antonius with an hostile inuation entred the citie of Rome, the armic of M. Lepidus, who was left there as warden of the Citie being discomfitted, and afterward departing thence toward Fraunce, was intercepted by Cæsar, who besieged him a long time at Perulia, in the countrey of He-fuffering a repulse, he was constrained to submir him selte, whom Cæsar pardoned, but many of the Senators and Romane Knights were facrificed vpon the altar of Iulius Cefar. He'destroyed Perusia, and having broughtinto his power all the armie of the contrarie fide ended that warre, Cn. Domitius Caluinus, and C. Asinius Pollio being Consuls, Pollio was a man of notable gifts, who howfoeuer matters befell, was loued of all sortes of men. Iulius Cæsar did make great reckening and accompt of him, after his death the enemics of Cæfar did greatly fauour him, M.Antonius had him in lingular æstimation, Octauius held him neare vnto his heart, an excellent scholer, and a worthic souldier the onely obiect of the learned, whom both in prose & poemes, they have condignely commended, so that I need not to proceede in his praises, this

The praise of Asinius Pollio.

ATROPOS, OR

this is my only doubt, whether he were more to be extolled for his laudable qualities, then admired for his rare and wonderfull fortune; he was not long before with Antonius in Ægypt, but feeing him so vainely besotted with the loue of Cleopatra, seeing him knight of the Cannapee, who was earst Lord of the field, being ashamed of him ashewas a Romane, ashamed of him as a General, ashamed of him as now an vnworthic companion for Pollio, he left him in Ægypt with his concubine, and came to Rome. Afterward Cæsar and Lepidus fell at variance, so that Lepidus was compelled to surrender all his authority, and to stand to Cæsars mercie for his life. Cefar did then fight with Sex. Pompeius on the Certar figh. fca. Pompey being there ouercome fled to teth with Sex. Popeius Sicilie, and afterward into Asia, and as he was preparing warre against Antoni, he was take of M. Titius, Antonius his Lieutenant, by who he was flaine. The last civill warre which was betwixt the Romaines was that which was fought by Cæsar against Antoni at Assium. The occasion of emnitie betwixt them was thus, Antonius did reproue Cæsar because he had taken to himself the armie of Lepidus & that which followed Sex. Pompeius, which ought to have bene common to them three. Cæsar did obiect to Antonius, that he did keepe Ægypt without lawfull commission, that he caused Sex. Pompeius to be slaine without his consent, that he cast Artauasdes a Prince, leagued with the Romans, and taken by trecheric, into prison, & dishonored him, with gyues and fetters, to the great infamic of the Romanes, that he was more familiar with Cleopatra then became an honest man, that he had bestowed too great giftes ypon her, that he had called Cæsars surmised bastard begotten of Cleopatra, Cesarion, to the great disgrace of that house. These things privately by letters and publikely by messenflament of M, Antonius, stament in the open Senate, which came to gers, were mentioned by mutuall objection. Cæsar afterward did reade Antonius his tehis hands by this meane. Certaine fouldiers which did flie fro Antonius to him, told him that the authentike will or testament of M. Antonius, did remaine in the custodie of the Virgins vestall, of whom Cæsar did obtaine

ATROPOS, OR

it, the tenor and forme whereof was thus.

I M. Antonius one of the three states of The testamet Rome, and the sonne of M. Antonius, do by nius, this my last will and testament make and ordaine Philadelphus & Alexander my fonnes by Cleopatra, the heires of all my wealth and substance, which I had by descent from M. Antonius my father; but with this clause, and vpon this condition, that if I die in Rome or elsewhere, they shall solemnely conuey my bodie to Alexandria in Ægypt, and bestow it there in a marble fepulcher, which by this my will shall be made for my selfe and Cleopatra the Queene of Ægypt. But if they faile of this or do otherwise, without lawfull or vegent cause, then I will that all these things which I leaue vnto my aforesaid sons, be converted to the vse & behoofe of the Nuns of Vesta, & my ghost thal implore the assistace of the Potifex-Maximus, & the priests of Iupiter which are in the Capitol, to folicit the spirits of vengeance to punish the vnthankfulnesse of my sons, & then I ordaine & wil, that the Pontifex Maximus shall cause my bodie to be reposed in a convenient sepulcher, within the walles of this citie, and I will also that as many bondflaues as be now in my power, shall presently after my death be manumitted & made free by the Prætor; and to euerie of my other seruants I bequeath a Sestertian, & a mourning garment. Lastly, I do pronounce by this my last will and testament, that Cæsarion the son of Cleopatra, is the true, certaine, and vndoubted sonne of C. Iulius Cæsar. And to the aforesaid Cleopatra, I giue all my wealth and treasure, that I have gained, purchased and atchieued either in warre or in peace. Done by me M. Antonius vj. kal. Iul. Ap. Claudius, C. Norbanus Coss.

195

VVhen the people of Rome had heard the purport of this testament, they thought that Antonius his drift, was to give Rome to Cleopatra, for a speciall favour, for which cause they were maruellously moved against Antonius. Cæ ar did behave him selse in this matter very wisely and warily, for in wordes he prætended warre against Cleopatra only, and caused it to be proclaimed by the heralt, that the Ægyptian Queene did intend the suppressing of the Romanes. That was done by Cæfar, to the end that he might auoyd the hatred of manie noble men, who did rather affect Antonius then him. But whe Antonius for the loue of Cleopatra wold neither come into the citie to render account of his doings, nor depose his Triumuiracie, but was wholly busied in præparing warre against Italie, Cæfar did furnish himselse as well for sea as for land: he therefore gathered manie fouldiers out of Spaine, Fraunce, Lybia, Sardinia and Sicilia. Antonius likewise did make an armie of Asians, Thracians, Macedonians, Græcias, Ægyptians and Cyrenians. And in the yeare following C. Cæfar and M. Messalla being Confuls, Antonius and Cleopatra at Actium a promontorie of Epirus, encountred Cæsar, who having prosperous successe in many battels against them, as well on sea as on land, they being at length ouercome fled to Alexandria in Ægypt. Cæsar did sacrifice all the Octaulus Cae pinasses which he had taken in warre, to A-far facrifisch allthe Pinna. pollo, who was worshipped at Actium, as a ses to Apollo. monument of thankfulnesse for his victorie, and did also institute a fine yeres solemnitie, which was called the folemnitie of Actium, Octanius buildeth Nicopolis.

ATROPOS, OR besides this he built a faire temple to Apollo, and in the place where his tents were pitched he founded a great city called Nicopolis, the citie of victorie. Asinius Pollio did still præserue the auncient amitie that was betwixt him and M. Antonius, for when Cæsar at his departing from Rome, requested him that he would ioyne with him, in his warres against Antonius, he made this answer: The benefites of Antonius towards me, will not permit me to be an enemie vnto him, and my merites at the hands of Antonius be farre otherwise, the that Antonius should be an enemie vnto me, wherefore leaving both and leaning to neither, I wil stay here in Italie, and be the spoile of the conqueror. Cæsar did asterward besiege Antonius & Cleopatra at Alexandria, where Antonius being in a most desperate plight, being in no possibilitie to recouer Cefars fauour, and hearing by a falle rumor, that Cleopatra was slaine, did suddenly stab himselfe. Cæartooke Alexandria, and with it Cleopatra, but because she would not grace Octavius so much as to be led in triumph by kiledby Asp- him, she put Aspes to her breasts, and was by them wormes.

them done to death, though her keeper had præcise charge to looke carefully vnto her. Ægypt was then brought by Cæsar into the forme of a prouince, and having made Cornelius Gallus Præsident there, he came to Rome, where he had a triple triumph, the one of Dalmatia, which he brought to conformitie after his warre finished against Sex. Pompeius, the other of Actium, the third of Alexandria. VVhen Cesar with the great applause and gratulation of the Romanes had pacified the whole præcinct of the world, and for that cause had shut the temple of Ianus the third time, and an augurie of faferie was celebrated, which two things were neuer done but when the whole Empire was in quietnesse, he purposed to depose the Empiric, & to bring the common-weale to a good & perfect constitution. To depose the Empirie, M. Agrippa did perswade him, but Mecenas did disswade him, whose opinion he yeelded vnto. V Vherfore endeuoring by law to confirme the Empirie, and to win the fauour and good estimation, as well of the Nobles and Senators, as of the people, he burnt all the letters which the citizens that were then in Rome or out of Rome had writte to Antonius, lest any Senator who did follow Antonius his faction, should thinke himselfe to be hated of Cæsar for that cause, & so should attempt some mischiefe against him: he releeved the common stocke, which was greatly wasted by civill warres, with his owne private wealth, & them that were indebted to the common treasurie, the billes of debt being burnt with his owne handes, he did free from the daunger of the rolle. And whereas many things were done, in the tumults and seditions of the citizens, against law and custome by Lepidus and Antonius, he did repeale them by an Edict, and made his fixth Consulship, which he then enioyed to be the death-day of these lawes; by which meanes when he had worthily drawne vnto him the hearts of the people, yet in one thing he pleased them about the rest, which was done rather of pollicie the of plaine meaning: for having singled out a great number. of Senators, whose loue toward him was specially approued, in a very frequent Senate, he did offer to furrender the Empire into the hands hands of the Senators and people. But some of the Senators, because they suspected that his wordes differed from his meaning, some because they did feare greater daunger by a popular estate, others because they seared his displeasure, if they should agree vnto it, they did with one voice refuse the offer, and ioyned in earnest sute and humble petition vnto him, that he would be the fole gouernour and absolute Emperour of Rome, and for that cause they did decree that the stiped of those who did guard his person should be doubled, that he might be in more safetie by that meane, both to his friends and to the comonweale. V Vhen by the franke affent of the Senate and people, he had thus, not confirmed the auncient Empirie, but in deed created a new Monarchie, that he might seeme popular, he was content to charge him selfe with the weightie affaires of the Empire: but the authoritie and dignitie thereof he did comunicate with the people: and therefore vnto the Senate and people he did allot Numidia, Asia, Græcia, Epirus, Dalmatia, Macedonia, Sicilia, Creta, Cyrene, Bythinia, Pontus, Sardinia and Hispania Betica: which were the more peaceable and quiet countries. To him selfe he tooke the other parts of Spaine, and all Fraunce, Narbonensis, Lugdunensis, Aquitanica Celtica, likewise Germania, Colosyria, Phœnicia, Cyprus and Ægypt. And that he might void out of their minds all sufpition of Monarchie, the supreme authoritie that was assigned to him he did only restraine to ten yeres continuance. The Romanes did bestow diverse honors vpon Cæsar, planting The Romans before the doore of his Courta Bay tree, on plantabay the top whereof they fet a wreath of oaken Octaviushis boughs, fignifying that he was the man that had both ouercome their enemies, and fet their citie in safetie. They decreed also that his Court should be called a Pallace, so that in what region focuer the Romane Emperor did soiourne, his Court was called a Pallace, and that he should be called Augustus. For when many would have adorned him with some title of excellencie, Cæsar had a great desire to be called Romulus secundus, but because that did resemble too much the title of a king, he was content to be called Augustus, that is, maiesticall or divine. Thus had Cæsar the power of a king the stile only foreprised. In him all the dignities and magistracies did meere, he was sole Consul, in determining iudicially of publike affaires, fole Potifex, for he had that speciall title, sole Censor in taxing the Romanes by poales, and fining them for faults, fole Tribune, in abrogating these lawes & voiding these acts which were made and done by other magistrates: which though in shew they were manie, yet in deed there was now but one Magistrate in Rome, one Emperour, one Augustus; but these honors did not warrant Cæsars quietnesse, for he was endangered by many trecheries, and being thereby too seuere in punishing both the worthie and vnworthie, vpon suspition & furmise without anie formall proceeding against them, he did indeed minister oile vnto the flame of their malice. Amongst the rest Cn. Cornelius, whose grandfather was Cn. Pompeius Magnus, did with his complices imagine and conspire the death of Augustus, whom Cefar would not put to death, because he thought by that meane, he should gaine

no great securitie, neither would he deliuer them from imprisonment, lest others might take courage & counfell to attempt the like. VVith this doubt & perplexitie he was grieuously troubled, and cares did torment his mind both in the night and in the day time; wherefore walking alone in his garden, and musing what to do, Liuia the Empresse came vinto him, and prayed him of all loues to reucale vinto her, what griefe had encroched vpon his heart, and what was the cause of his vnusuall dumpes, to whom Casar made this « answer. Can any man, Liuia, be of a calme " and contented mind, against whom on every "fide are layd the mares of treason? Seeft thou "not how manie doe beliege my quietnesse, "whom the punishment of condemned per-« sons doth not only not deterre, but, as if there " were some hope of reward, others rush dese peratly forward to vulawfull attempts. Liuia "when the heard this, did thus reply. It is no a maruel, my Lord, il you be beset with dagers, " partly because you are a man, and therefore " borne to calvaltie, partly an Emperour, by " whose authoritie, because manie are put to death, death, many that live do conceive harred a- ,, gainst you; for a Prince canot only not please, all, but though he gouerne in most orderly ,, and peaceable maner, it cannot be otherwise, ,, but he should have many foes. For there be, not so many iust as iniurious, whose humours,, can neuer be satisfied, & they which be of the,, better fort do aime at great matters, which, because they cannot obtaine, and because, they are inferiour to others, are full of male-,. contentment, and for that cause they are of-, fended with their Prince. But the danger vnto ,, which you are subject by them which do not, cospire against your person, but against your, estate, cannot anie way be avoided. For if,, you were a priuate man, none would offer,, you iniurie, vnlesse he receiued wrong be-,, fore at your hands, but an Empire, and the,, reuenues thereof, they which have power do, rather affect, then they which are poore do,, loath. This though it be a point of vnconscio-, nable men, yet as other faults, so this is the, feed of nature, which out of some men nei-,, ther by rewards nor by threats you shall be a-, ble to extirpate: for neither feare nor lawe so scan do more then nature. V. Vhich being tho-« roughly cosidered, it will seeme a great deale "more convenient to strengthen and stablish se your Empire with faithfulnesse and loyaltic, « then with sharpnesse and rigor. Augustus did « thus reioyne: I know, Liuia, that the highest "things be most subject to hatred, & the grea-«test Emperours have the greatest enemies: "for if our cares, griefes and perils were nor « greater then the griefes and perturbations of « private me, we should be æqual to the Gods; "but this doth chiefly molest me, that I cannot « deuise anie remedie, which may cure & con-« quer this mischiefe. All men haue enemies, & « many have benefizine by enemies, but the euftate of Princes lieth to open to calualtic, that « we are costrained to scare our familiar frinds "and our daily acquaintance, with whom be-« cause we must continually converse, we do: "continually feare, and this maladie is more " hardly redressed then emnitie: for against our. « enemies we may oppose our friends, but if « our friends do faile vs, where is the our helpe? «therfore both solitude and multitude is grie-" unus vnto vs,& it is dangerous to be without agard,

ATROPOS, OR

a gard, burto have an vnfaithful gard is much s more dangerous. Apparant enemics may be » auoided, but false hearted friends we cannot , anieway shunne: for we must call the friends, ,, of whose constant faithfulnesse we can not s possibly be assured; for my selfe I do plainely » protest, that my heart abhorreth from the extremitie of punishment, and the necessitie of » torture goeth greatly against my mind. Then » faid Liuia, You haue spoken well my Lord, » burifyou will be aduised by me, & you ought , not to refule my counsell because it proceedeth from a woman; I will aduise you of that » which none of your friends will impart vnto » you, not because they are ignorant of it, but » forthat they dread your displeasure. V Vhich >> Augustus taking hold of, Tell itme Liuia » faid he whatfocuer it is. I will, faid Liuia, and , that as willingly as you would heare it, for I >> am made partaker of your destinie. Cæsar » being fafe I am Empresse, and he being difhonored, which misfortune the Gods auert, ,, I am also disgraced, and bereaued of gloric. That I may not vie an ambush of words, nor ,, alabyrinth of circumstances:my theame shallon "be one word, and that is, Clemencie. Change sthy course Augustus, and forgine some of thy " foes, manie things may be healed by lenitic, s which crueltie can neuer cut off. Neither do «Ifpeake this, as if disloyall and irregular per-" fons thould generally and without difference " receive mercie, nay they that be notoriously "flained, and branded with conspiracie, they sthat trouble the quietnesse of the Common-"weale, they that are ouerflowed with vices, "whose life is nothing else but leudnes, so that "they are past hope or helpe, cut them off my « Augustus, as the putrified parts of a distem-" pered bodie: but they which either through "the infirmitie of youth, or the imprudency of " mind, or through ignorance or mischaunce « have offended, or which against their willes "haue bene drawne into daunger, admonish "them; but with minatorie speeches; and let "them finde grace but with condition. Some "thou mayest punish with exile, some with in-« famie, and some with money; and that none may be vniustly condemned, nor by a fained se accusation suffer death, let the truth be tried wby such proofes, as may worthilie beapproucd.

ued. For it behooveth thee Augustus, not si onely to be free from doing wrong, but even » from thew and femblance of inturie, Private, men have done enough if they have not of., fended, but a Prince must endeuor not to be » suspected of faults. Thou rulest ouer men, not » ouer beafts, ouer Romanes, and not ouer si Barbarians, and the onely meane to lincke » their hearts vnto thee, is to benefite all and » to oppresse none. For though a man may be » constrained to seare, yethe cannot be enfor- >> ced to lone; for when the subject clearely di- » seemeth that his Prince is bountifull, he is >> foone perswaded: but when he is once resol- » ued vpon manifest præsumption, that some » be vniustly put to death, lest the same thing » happen vinto him, he may justly feare: and >> who he so feareth, he hateth with the strength >> of his heart. But a Prince is the priviledge of » his fubiects fecurity, that they take no harme, » neither of forreiners, nor of their fellow subiects, much lesse of their Prince & protector. >> And it is a great deale more magnificent and » glorious to faue then to kill : wherfore lawes, » benefites, admonitions must be vsed, that »

"men may become circumspect, & warie, and "further they must be so diligently watched " and observed, that though they would be, yet "they may not be traiterous; and they which " are greene in conceit, and as it were flexible " waxe to the stronger powers, must have per-« petuall conservatives lest they be corrupted: " and to tollerate the offences of some, is both "great wisedome and great manhood: for ife-"uerie mansfault thould be hisfall, the earth "would soone lacke inhabitants. Thinke my "good Augustus, that the sword cannot do all "things for thee: it cannot make men wife, it " cannot make them faithful: it may constraine. "them, but it cannot perswade them: it doth " pierce the heart of him that is slaine, but it "doth alienate the mind of him that doth line. "VVherefore alter thy opinion noble Empe-« rour, and by vsing elemencie they will thinke, " that all that thou hast heretofore done was " done by necessitie and against thy will, but if " thou perseuerest still in the same minde and " purpose, they will impute all that hath bene " done to the austeritie and sourceesse of thy " nature. V Vith these speeches of Liuia Augustus being moued, pardoned many, and ysed as much lenitie as his owne safetie would beare: whereby he purchased the entire loue of the Romanes, and all his life time after there was neuer anie treason attempted against him. Thus after civill emnities extinguished, forreine warres fully ended, iustice recalled, destiny satisfied, strength was restored to lawes, authoritie to Magistrates, dignitie to the Nobles, maiestie to the Senate, safetie to the people: the fieldes were without hinderance trimmed and tilled, the facrifices celebrated and solemnized, quietnesse returned to men, and euerie possession to his lawfull owner: good lawes were made, imperfect lawes were amended, bad lawes cancelled: the Senators were seuere without currishnesse, the people honest without con-

firaint and with this harmonic peace pleased the Romanes.

Еe

A Table of the principall matters contained in this historie according to the number of the Pages:

Ancus a great builder. M1. Autonius the orator put to death by Marine & Cinna.

11. Antoniushe belpeth Cafar 138. He is spared at the time whe Cafar is flain. 169 He fighteth with Panfan75 He fighteth with Hirtius. 176. He fighteth with both the Confuls ibid. Octanius becommeth an enemie unto him, ibid. He writeth contumelious letters to Brutus and Caffins. 180. The te-Cames of M. Antoniss. 193.

D. Bruius suffereth him felfe to be befreged by Antonius. 175. He is fluine.

Campania: the praise of it. 10 Carthage: the beginning of the second Corthagiawarre.12 Masinissa quarrellethwith the Carthaginians. 45. Scipio is sent as V mpier betwixt them and Masmiffa.46. the Citie of Carthage is burnt.

2. Capio is flaine. C. Inline Cafar : he is inclined to fedition. 102 bis originall 107. his death is fought for by Sillaes officers: 108, the Helnetians fled before Cafar 116. they are ouercome by him. 117. he pur (weth battel against Arionistalibidhe fightesh against the Belgians and Nerrians, ibid, he ouerthroweth the Germanes ibd. he burneth the villages of the Sicambrians. 118. he ouercommeth the Britaines ibid, he is reconciled to the Britaines, ibid. he renueth against them.ibid. the Eburons are onercome by him. 119. his remence upon the French rebels, 120, a decreemade by the Senate that he should dismisse his armie.122 he is incensed by Curio against the Senate. $23. bis passionate speech against the Senate, ibid, he pardoneth Domitius. 127. he feifeih the treasurie. 131.be marcheth toward Spaine, ibid. the strangers which were affiftant affiftant to Cafar. 133. the Casarians, give the first asfault to Pompey. 140. his Speech to Domitius. 143 the dreames and visions of the Cefarians. 145. he is entertained of Cleopatra. 148. he is affaulted by the King of Egypt. 149. he (wimmeth in the riner of Nilmibid.he addressah against Pharnaces. 150. he putteth Phanaces to flight.ibid.he encoutreth P. Scipio, ibid, histriumphes are described. 156 Salust maketh an oration to him. 157. the great hondurs bestowed upon him. 165. he fighteth with Cn. Pompeius Cicero : he is called Paerpathe younger at the Citie of Simille ibid the causes of the conspiracie bent against him. 167. he is flaine in the Senate house. 168. the Lam Portia broken by the killing of him. 169. the Law Cornelia also broken. 2. Catulus : the diffention of Lepidus and Catulus. 16.76 Q. Catulus cause of his owne Portius Cato is flaine. M. Portius Cato Itichusis his lignage. 102. bispraife.ibid. he killeth himfelfe. Catiline: bis qualities. 83. bis lignage.85 . he killeth his own Sonne. 86. he is greatly indebted. 87. he is forbidden to make fute for the Confulfhip.ibed.bis impudent answere to Ciceroes oration.

THE TABLE.

Cincinnatus his speedy warre.9 L. Cinna: he beginneth a new broyle. 62. he is expulsed the Citie. ibid. he ismade Captaine of a feditious armic. ibid, be calleth C. Marius from banishment.63 . a great fight betwirt him and Cn. Pompeius Strabo. 64. he entreth the Citie. ibid. he is Naine.

tria, 83. bis oration against Catiline, 92. he mourneth. 112.he committeth himfelfe to voluntarie exile. 113. a Sharpe law is made concerning his banishment. ibid.he is recalled from banishment. 114, he is put to death. 185. Fuluines despitefull dealing with his toung. 186 Cleopatra killed by Affivorms.

Clodius: he being tribune of the people becommeth fediti- . ous.109. be feckerb renenge upon Cicero: 110. be is infamous for adulterie with

F.c. 2

Pompeia Gafars wife, ibid. for incest with his sisters. ibid. he is condemned by the Senate. ibid. be persisteth to be an enemie to Cicero. 114 he burneth the house of 2. Cicero.ibid. he threatneth death to Sanctia. 115, he is Staine by Milo-Cornelia: she lamenteth her children.

Drusis: bis bard fortune. 22 be is flaine. 34 his repulse is the beginning of the Italian warre.

Ful. Flaccius arebellious Senator flaine.

A. Gabinius: after a prosperom fight he is flaine. C. Gracchius: he is a rebell to alles. 26, he is beheaded.27

Italie: the Italian warre, 15

At. Lepidus : the diffention of Lepides and Catalus. C. Alarius: the contention bebesiegeth the Capitall. 31 he putteth the conspiratours to death. ibid. he destroyeth Saturninus bis honfesbidbe taketh lugurtha by Sillaes meanes. 28. his 3. 4. 5. 6. Consulships, 29. his great victorie against the Cimbrians, ibid, he is in high reputation. 34. he putteth Vetti-W Cato to flight. 52.he fighteth equally with the Marsians. 53. he is disliked by the Conful Portius. 54. his ambition. 59. his extreame miserie, 60. a captine saue is the state. 25. his seditious Mancinus: his punishment for breaking truce. Metellus : he opposeth him-Selfe against Saturninus.30 Metellushis speech to Cafar. Merula: he cutteth in peeces his owne veine.

twist bim and Silla . 15. he fent to kill him. 61. the Minturnians are friends to him. ikid. being recalled frombanishment be entreth the Citie. 64. Octanius is put to death by his cruckie. 65. he he committeel bimselfe to voluntariebanishment, ibid. Mubridates an enemie to the Romanes. $5.58 Numa

Numa religious. Numantia : the Numantine

Octaum bis request to the Senate. 177. he reconcileth himselfe to M. Antonius & M. Lepidus, ibid. M. Gicero doth greatly commeend bim. 178. he taketh Clodia to wife. 179. he besiegeth Perusia. 190. he fighteth with Sex. Pompeius. 191. he readeth the testament of M. Antonius. 192, he facrificeth all the Pinasses which he hath taken to Apollo.195. he, buildeth Nicopolis, 196, the Romanes plant a bay tree before his

Opimius his proclamation. 26

C. Perperna discharged C. of Popedius. Sulo Popedius a nahis lieuetnancie. Asinius Pollio: the praise of

him. Cn. Pampeius Strabo: his vi-

Etories. 55. he triumpheth. <6. his diffembling and vnconstancie. 63. a great fight betwixt him and Cinna. 64 Cn. Pompesus Magnus: his Rome built.

great dignitie in Rome. 16 Cafar cannot brooke it ibid. be & 2 Catulus fight with Lepidus and ouer come him. 77. Mithridates is onerthrowne by Pompey. 106.be entreth the Temple of Icrusalemibid he is bonoured with a triple triumph. 107. he matcheth with Inha Ca- . fars daughter. 109. his Presidentship in Spaine proroguid. 121. he is appointed by the Senate generall against Casar. 127. Domitius flyeth to Pompey. 128 the forreiners which were readie in armes for the affitance of him. 122, his oration to his fouldiers. 134. be putteth Cafar to flight.138 he marshalleth his armie. 139.he flyeth to Lariffa.144 he tranelleth to AEgypt. 146. he is flaine by the AEgyptians.

turall enemie to the Romans. 40, his oration to the Marsians. 41. he is flaine.

Tyrrhus fighting against the Romanes.

Ee 3

Remanes : the Romanes made wanton by profperitie 19 the Romane Embasadors are despised of Hanniball. 44 the esthenians faithfull to the Romans. 67. the (olemnitie which the Romanes vied in their proceeding to the Senate. 89. treacherie. Scipio Nasica: his familie, 22 against the Romanes in Fraunce. 119. what thing atriumph was amongst the Romans, and how performed. ISI. they bestow many Seruitins : he is Proconsult and honors upon Cafar. 166 Romulus eagrest in fight. 8 Romulus & Remus bast ards. A2. nourished by a wolfe shid. Remus is faine by Romalus. P. Rutilius is flaine.

Saturninus : he caufeth C. Memmius to be flain, 21. his house is destroyed by Marias, shid, he is a brocher of Sedition. 30. Q. Metellus opposeth himselfe against resb Saturninus. Saguntines: the miserable fa- Sulpitius: a seditions Tribune mine of the Saguntines. 44 Sabines: the rape of the Sabine virgins. P. Scipio Affricamusthe elder L. Sylla: his victorie Samnites.

his valor. P. Scipio Affricanns the younger : his prowelle. 18. he is fent backe into Spaine. 24.he furprifeth Numantia, ibid. he is found dead in his bed.25 his body is brought out into the Streete. he opposeth himself to Gracchus. Sernius taxeth the Romanes by poles. is flaine by the commotioners of Italy. Sertorius: he lenieth armes in Spaine. 77. he feareth Pompey. 106. Linius Salinator the Lieutenant of Sertorius is flaine. 77. Sertorius 85 Spartacus : he being a feuceplayer doth encounter the army of the Consuls. 81, he taketh the citie of the Thurians. ibid. M. Crassus appointed for the warre against him. him. ibid. Marius fauo- Sulpitius: he bringeth the Marrucines to obedience.

> altereth the State, 59. murder is committed by him. ibid.

55. he killeth Cluentins. ibid he is made Confull. 57 his contrario nature ibid.his descent, ibid. be besiegeth Nola. 58, his remenge vpon the feditions. Got his hard conditions of peace concluded with Alithridates. 68 the King of Parthia fendeth Embassadors to him. ibid. he paffeib quietly through Italy. 69. he difmiffeth Serfighteth with Telesinus a the younger is flaine by his fouldiers. 72. he vsurperb the Distatorship. ibid, he neste to be flaine.73.he puttethinpractife profeription. 73. M. Marins is flaine by bim. 74. bis rage against Pletorius.ibid. the ashes of C. Marcus throwne into a riner by Sylla. 75. he dieth.

Tarquin banished. 1. his ornaments. 8. proud Tarquin. occasioner of liberties. torius without hurt. 70c he Trenirate a Trenirate first made in Rome. Samnite. 71. C. Marius Tullus an artificiall Captaine.

causesh the souldiers of Pra- Viriathus an enemie to the Romanes.

FINIS.

•	•	~		4-+	4.1	+ 1	W W .	Pres.
	£.	21	-/\	- 6		2.4	11	- 1
٠.	٠.	21	-4 6	- 4		**		-

Faults	Tag.	Gorrettion
Monarchies.	Pag-4	Monarches.	3
Clozna	pag. 9.	Cloælia.	÷
Malifius.	pag 10.	Massicus.	٠.
deoulder and the state	pagato. da	and a clouds of the contract of
Glapcias.	Pag-37.	Glaucias	ć.
Equatius.	pag. 52.	Egnatius.
Petiani,	pag.cc.	Peligni.
	pag.78.	Valentia.	1
Enomaus.	p.g.80.	Enomaus.
Confulians.	P18.91	Consularians.
it greeneth my hart.	pagiroo.	it grated my hart.
the Pictons.	10	15 T 1 T 1 T 1 T 1 T 1 T 1 T 1 T 1 T 1 T
the Tureus	1.6.	the Turens.
the Audians . 7 1 1	/ P-D	From the Andians, present
Achilles.	Pag.147.	Achillas.
aggrauate,	pag-173.	arrogate.
Atla was.	, bag.120.	Atia, who was.
V .		weet a single mainly	٠.
	4,	ક કરવાના કરો છે. કે માર્ગ માટે કરો છે કરો છે કરો છે. કે
or end that the second		er i Lithelie feath breek live
61 - 19	N1:13/4 -	માં છે. દર્શાં છે છે છે હતું મુખ્યત્વાદ
	·

•

31/41/4

A Table of the principall matters contained in this historie according to the number of the Pages:

Ancus a great builder. M. Antonius the orator put to death by Marini & Cinna.

M. Antonius be belpeth Cafar 138. He is spared at the time whe Cafar is fluin.169 He fighteth with Panfan75 He fighteth with Hirtius, 176. He fighteth with both the Confuls ibid Octanius becommeth an enemie unto him, ibid. He writer b contumelions letters to Brutus. and Coffins. 180. The te-Camet of M. Antonius. 193.

D. Brutus suffereth him selfe to be befreged by Antonius. 175. He is flaine.

Campania: the praise of it. 10 Carthage: the beginning of the Jecond Corthagiawarre. 12 Masinissa quarrellethwith the Carthaginians. 45. Scipio is fent as V mpier betwint them and Masiniffa.46. the Citie of Carthage is burnt.

Q. Capio is flaine. C. Inline Cafar : he is inclined to fedition. 102 bis originall 107 his death is fought for by Sillaes officers. 108. the Helnessans fled before Cafar, 116, they are ouercome by him. 117, he pur (weth battel against Arionistalibidhe fighteth against the Belgians and Nerrians, ibid, he ouershroweihthe Germanes ibd. he burneth the villages of the Sicambrians. 118. he onercommeth the Britaines ibid, he is reconciled to the Britaines, ibid, he renucth against them. bid. the Eburons are onercome by him. 119, his remenge upon the French rebels, 120, a decreemade by the Senate that he Should dismisse his armie.122 he is incensed by Curio against the Senate. $23, his passionate speech against the Senate. ibid. he pardoneth Domitsu. 127. be feifeih the treasurie. 131.bemarcheth toward Spaine, ibid. the strangers which were assistant.

THE TABLE.

, affiftant to Cafar. 133. the Cafarians give the first affault to Pompey. 140. his Beech'to Domitius. 143.the dreames and visions of the Cafarians. 145. he is entertained of Cleopatra. 148. be is affaulted by the King of Cincinnatus his speedy warre.9 - Egypt. 149. he (wimmeth in the river of Nilus, ibid.he addressah against Pharnaces. 150. he putteth Phanaces to flight abid, he encoutreth P. Scipio, ibid, histriumphes are described. 156 Salust maketh an oration to him. 157. the great honours bestowed upon him. 165. he fighteth with Cn. Pompeius Cicero : he is called Pacrpathe younger at the Citie of Simille.ibid.the causes of the conspiracie bent against him. 167. he is flaine in the Senate house. 168, the Lam Portia broken by the killing of him. 169. the Law Cornelia also broken. Q. Catulus : the dissention of Lepidus and Catulus. 16.76 Q. Catuliu cause of his owne Cleopatra killed by Aspinorms. Portins Cato is flaine. M. Portius Cato Itichusis his lignage. 102. bis praise ibid. he killeth himselfe. Catuline: bis qualities. 83. bis

lignage.85 he killeth his own sonne. 86. he is greatly indebted. 87. he is forbidden to make fute for the Confulfhip.ibid.bis impudent an-Swere to Ciceroes oration.

L. Cinna: he beginneth a new broyle, 62, he is expulsed the Citie.sbid. be is made Captaine of a feditions armie. ibid, be calleth C. Marius from banishment. 62 . a great fight betwint him and Cn. Pompeius Strabo. 64. he entreth the Citie. ibid. he is Staine.

trie. 83. his oration against Catiline. 92. he mourneth. 1 1 2.he committeth himfelfe tovoluntarie exile. 113. 4 Sharpe law is made concerning his banishment . ibid.he is recalled from banishment. 114. he is put to death. 185. Fuluiaes despitefull dealing with his toing. 186

Clodius: he being tribune of the people becommeth feditious.109, he fecketh renenge upon Cicero: 110. he is infamous for adulterie with Pompeia Gafars wife, ibid. for incest with his listers. ibid he is condemned by the Senate. ibid. he persistes to be an enemie to Cicero. 114 he burneth the house of 2. Cicero. ibid. be threatneth death to Santtia. 115. be is Same by Milo-Cornelia: The lamenteth her children.

Drufus : bis hard fortune. 32 he is flaine. 34 his repulse is the beginning of the Italian warre.

Ful. Flaccus arebellious Senator staine.

A. Gabinius: after a prosperous fight he is flaine. C. Gracchins : he is a rebell to attes. 26, he is beheaded.27

Italie: the Italian warre, 15

C. Alarius: the contention be-twist him and Silla. 14. he bestegeth the Capitall. 31 he putteth the conferatours to death. ibid. he destroyeth Saturnines bis honfeabidhe taketh lugartha by Sillaes meanes. 28. his 3. 4. 5. 6. Consulships. 29. his great victorie against the Cimbrians, ibid. he is in high reputation. 34. he putteth Vetti-W Cato to flight. 52 he fighteth equally with the Marsians. 53. be is disliked by the Conful Portius. 54. his ambition. 59. his extreame miserie, 60. a captine slane is fent to kill him. 61.the Minturnians are friends to him. ibid. being recalled frombanishment he entreth the Citie. 64. Octaniss is put to death by his cruekie. 65. he deeth. the state. 25. his seditious Mancinus: his punishment for breaking truce. Metellus : he opposeth himselfe against Saturninus.30 he committesh bimfelfe to voluntariebanishment. ibid. Metellim his speech to Cafar. M. Lepidus : the diffention of Merula : he cutteth in peeces his owne veine. Muthridates an enemie to the Romanes.

15.58 Numa

Numa religious. Numantia : the Numantine

N

Octanius his request to the Senate. 177. he reconcileth himselfe to M. Antonius & M. Lepidus, ibid. M.Cicero dosh greatly commeend him. 178, he taketh Clodia to wife. 179. he besiegeth Perusia. 190. he fighteth mith Sex. Pompeius. 191. he readeth the testament of M. Antoninis. 192, he facrificeth all the Pinasses which he bath taken to Apollo.195. he buildesh Nicopolis. 196. the Romanes plant a bay tree before his Opimus his proclamation. 26

C. Perperna discharged C. of Popedius. Silo Popedius a nahis lieuernancie. Asmins Pollie : the praise of

Cn. Pampeius Strabo : his vi-Etories. 55. he triumpheth. 56. his diffembling and vnconstancie. 63. a great fight betwixt him and Cinna. 64

Romanes.

Cn. Pompeius Magnus: his Rome built.

great dignitie in Rome. 16 Cafar cannos brooke is ibid. he & Q Catulusfight with Lepidus and ouercome him. 77. Mithridates is onerthrowne by Pompey. 106.he entreth the Temple of Icrusalem.ibid.he is honoured with a triple triumph. 107. be matcheth with Inlia Cafars daughter. 109. his Presidentship in Spaine proroguid. 121. he is appointed by the Senate generall against Casar. 127. Domitins flyeth to Pompey, 128 the forreiners which were readicin armes for the affitance of him. 132. bis oration to his souldiers 134. he putteth Cafar to flight. 138 he marshalleth his armie. 139.he flyeth to Larissa.144 he tranelleth to AEgypt. 146. he is flaine by the AEgyptians.

turall enemie to the Romans, 40. his oration to the Marsians. 41. he is slaine.

Tyrrhus fighting against the Romanes : the Romanes made bis valor. wanton by profestie 19 the P. Scipio Affricanns the youn-Romane Emba Jadors are despised of Hanniball, 44 the Athenians faithfull to the Romans. 67. the (olem- he is found dead in his bed.25 nitie which the Romanes vied in their proceeding to the streete. the Senate. 89. treacherie. Scipio Nasica: his familie, 22 against the Romanes in Fraunce. 119. what thing chus. a triumph was among fithe Sernius taxeth the Romanes Romans, and how perforby poles. med. 151. they bestow many Seruitins: he is Proconsult and honors upon Cafar. 166 Romulus eagrest in fight. 8 of Italy. Romulus & Remus bast - Sertorius; he leuieth armes in ards. A2. nourished by a molfe, shid. Remus is flaine by Romalus. P. Rutilius is flaine.

Saturninus : he causeth C. Memmius to be flain, 21 . his house is destroyed by Marias, shid, he is a brocher of sedition. 30. Q. Metellus opposeth himselfe against retb Saturninus. Saguntines: the miserable famine of the Saguntines. 44 Sabines: the rape of the Sabine virgins.

ger: his prowelle. 18. he is fent backe into Spaine. 24.he Curprifesh Numantia. ibid. his body is brought out into he opposeth himself to Gracis flaine by the commotioners Spaine. 77. he feareth Pomper. 106. Linius Salinator the Lieutenant of Sertorius is flaine. 77. Sertorius is Spartaciu : he being a feuceplayer doth encounter the army of the Confuls. 81.he taketh the citie of the Thuvians, ibid. M. Crassus appointed for the warre against him. him. ibid. Marins fano- Sulpitius : he bringeth the Marrucines to obedience. Sulpitius: a seditions Tribune altereth the State, 59. murder is committed by him. ibid. P. Scipio Affricanusthe elder L. Sylla: his victorie Samuites.

55. he killeth Cluentius. ibid he is made Confull. 57 his contrario nature ibid.his descent. ibid. be besiegeth. Nola. 58. his revenge vpon the feditions. 60: his hard conditions of peace concludedwith Withridates. 68 the King of Parthia sendeth Embassadors to him. ibid. he paffeth quietly through Italy. 69. he difmiffeth Serfighteth with Telesinus a the younger is slaine by his souldiers. 72. he vsurpeth the Dictatorship. ibid, he neste to be flaine.73.he puttethin practife profeription. 23. M. Marius is flaine by him. 74. his rage against Pletorius.ibid. the ashes of C. Marcus throwne into a riner by Sylla. 75. he dieth.

Tarquin banished. 1. his ornaments. 8. proud Tarquin occasioner of liberties 9 torius without hurt. Joc he Trenirate: a Trenirate first made in Rome. Samnite. 71. C. Marins Tullus an artificiall Captaine.

causeth the souldiers of Pra- Viriathus an enemie to the Romanes.

FINIS.

THE DESIGNATION OF THE PARTY OF

Faults	Pag.	in in A site water	Gorrettion.
	Pag.4		Monarches.
Cloznia	pag. 9	L. 1997.11	Cloælia.
Malfitus.	pag. 10.	$ j = 2 1 5 5 5	Mafficus.
couldes.	pag.10.	Burney !	clouds.
Glancias.	pagar.	ger link is	Glaucias
Equatius.	pag. 52.		Egnatius.
Staria	pag. 52. pag. 53.	41.	Stabia.
Petrone	1110.00.	5 18165	Peligni.
Talentia.	pag.78.	18 B 18 B 18 B	Valentia.
Enomaus.	pag.78.		Enomaus.
Confulians.	Pag.91.		Confularians.
it greeueth my hart,	pagiroo.		it grateth my hart.
the Pictons.	pag.119.	المات برابا	the Pictons.
the Tureus	pag. 110.		the Turens.
the Audians.	Pag. 130.	11.000	the Andians.
Achilles.	pag.147.	and the	Achillas.
aggravate.	pag.173.		arrogate.
Atia was.	pag.176.		Atia, who was.
		ijas (j. s.)
$\sim M_{\odot}$	•	र्वेश्वर् । उ	Sharasina.
, Y			ACCURACY SE
	1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1	CARTONS .	A track of the track
TERLITORAL MAGICAN	genda bêrt		And State falls
	landi Mili Tanna		an Arthrope Calls a Caladal Barr

HIMET